Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I desire to make a further personal statement. I listened yesterday to a large part of the address made by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN]; but, sitting far away across the Chamber, I did not hear very distinctly his opening remarks. Upon reading them in the RECORD to-day I find that the Senator departed from that high plane of discussion which had characterized the deliberations of the Senate on this bank bill, and, as I conceive, descended to a level of which he may not reasonably be proud. In fact, he discussed the bill in his opening remarks in a vein of petty politics and undertook by implication, but without any sanction of the truth, to impute to members of the subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee actions of a highly improper nature. He also aspersed, unjustly and without warrant of fact, the technician of that committee, who is as honorable a man as ever I came in contact with in all my life, not in any measure exceeded in that respect by the Senator from New Jersey.

When the subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate was charged with the very difficult and complex task of inquiring into the banking problem and recommending to the Senate a reformation of the system, naturally it required the services of a technician, of a man thoroughly versed in practical banking and understanding the theory and philosophy of banking.

Upon my suggestion the subcommittee, without dissent, authorized me to employ Dr. H. Parker Willis as the technician and adviser of the committee. If the Senator from New Jersey does not know, perhaps he is among few Senators who do not know the record of this outstanding publicist. Doctor Willis was the technical adviser of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives on several notable occasions. He was the technical adviser of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, and did an immense amount of work in the preliminary preparations of that committee in the drafting of the Federal reserve act. He was the technician and the professional adviser of the joint congressional committee which framed the Federal land bank act. He is greatly distinguished as a political economist, having been a professor of political economy in some of the notable universities of this country. He was for four years the secretarial adviser of the Federal Reserve Board here in Washington after that system was set up, being present at all the board's discussion and intimately acquainted with every action taken and the reasons therefor. After voluntarily relinquishing that position he was made the technical research head of the Federal reserve system. So thoroughly familiar was he with the philosophy and practical details of banking that he was invited to the Philippine Islands to set up a banking system for the government there, and for nearly two years he was president and practical manager of the branch of the Philippine bank in New York. He set up a banking system for the Free State of Ireland. His services were engaged by some of the Balkan States to modify their banking systems. He was for some years the chief editor, and, I think, a part owner of the

New York Journal of Commerce, perhaps the outstanding trade newspaper of the United States for the last half century. Doctor Willis is now a professor in the business school of Columbia University, New York City.

I mention these facts in order that the RECORD may show that the subcommittee was deliberate and, in some degree at least, circumspect in its selection of a technician and a professional adviser. The amount of work that Doctor Willis did for the committee is almost inconceivable. He prepared all the preliminaries for the long and exhaustive hearings which we held in January and February of 1931; he prepared every searching questionnaire that went out to the thousands of banks and trust companies in this country. I could bring here to the Senate a stack of data that would reach to the top of this desk indicative of the tremendous amount of technical and professional work that he performed as a preliminary to the consideration and deliberations of the subcommittee and of the Banking and Currency Committee. He suggested impartially the names of the experienced bankers, business men, and economists, who appeared before the committee and summarized and analyzed their testimony. He examined with patient care every one of the various proposals submitted and, over a period of 16 months, did the technical drudgery of the committee.

Why the Senator from New Jersey should have felt prompted to assail the technician of the committee, except upon the assumption, which clearly may be discerned in his remarks, that the technician is responsible for the so-called Glass bill, and that by discrediting this professional gentleman he might in some sense discredit the bill, is beyond me to conjecture.

The Senator from New Jersey asserts that when he attended the hearing at which Mr. Eugene Meyer testified regarding the bill, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] and I had Doctor Willis, as it were, to act as "wet nurse" for us, suggesting that we were so ill informed and so stupid that we were unable to propound questions on our own account and that Doctor Willis took charge of the examination. I want to be temperate, but I want to be exact. There is not a word of truth in that statement. If during the whole hearing, whether the first or the last, Doctor Willis ever found it necessary to prompt me to ask a single question I have no recollection of it. I confidently assume that this is true as to Senator BULKLEY. Sometimes, upon mere technical issues, I may have asked Doctor Willis questions. Very likely I did, and I have no apology to make for that. Of course the distinguished Senator from New Jersey is so versed in technical matters and so thoroughly understands the philosophy of banking and is so intimately acquainted with all the aspects of the problem as that he would not have found it necessary to confer with the technician; but I was not so fortunate. I hold in my hand now the printed copy of the hearings of Mr. Meyer's testimony; and if the Senator from New Jersey can take it and point to a single question asked by me that was necessary to be referred to Doctor Willis, or any other technician, I will resign my seat in the Senate. Therefore I resent the imputation that those of us who had to do with the preparation of this bill were so unacquainted with the matters involved that we had to be tutored at a public hearing. The statement simply is not true, however offensive it was intended to be.

Then, again, the Senator from New Jersey charges the technician with having, by reason of his connection with the committee, obtained confidential information from the comptroller's office and from other sources and disclosed it to a foreign newspaper. I deny that there is a word of truth in that assertion. The Comptroller of the Currency several hours ago in my office made to me the statement that if Doctor Willis had ever been in his office since he had held it he had no recollection of it. He also authorized the statement, which I know to be true, that the comptroller's office had never communicated one word in confidence to the technician of the subcommittee; and, as chairman of that subcommittee, I assert that the comptroller's office never imparted any information to the subcommittee except at public hearings and has not to this day made a written comment on the provisions of this bill.

Then there was the childish statement that cablegrams sent by Doctor Willis to a French financial paper with which he had been associated for years, which cablegrams were invited by the paper, touching upon the inflationary tendencies of the times in the United States caused the exportation of $357,000,000 of gold. How incomprehensible it is that a United States Senator could be that credulous! As a matter of fact, everybody, including the Secretary of the Treasury, was talking inflation, though afterwards the latter amended his terminology and called it "expansion." When the Glass-Steagall bill was proposed he was reported in the press to have said it comprehended an "expansion" of $10,000,000,000.

The governor of the largest of the Federal reserve banks was quoted in the New York Times as saying that the legislation thus proposed involved a potential inflation of credits and of currency of $35,000,000,000! Speeches were made in both branches of the Congress vehemently advocating a large degree of inflation. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation was set up, as some mildly claimed, to "arrest deflation"; but all of us with any knowledge of the problem know that it was intended to inflate credits by granting extraordinary loans outside the province of orthodox banking.

We had a proposition in another branch of Congress to issue $2,000,000,000 of nontaxable and non-interest-bearing bonds for bonus purposes, the chief argument being its inflationary effect on the currency. We had propositions in this body to issue two billions and more of greenbacks. These suggestions are pending now. The responsible newspapers of the country were literally crowded with talk, in their dispatches and in their editorial comments, about the desirability of inflating the currency and the credits of the country. Some Members of Congress urged bimetalism; others insisted it would be a good thing if the United States should go off the gold standard.

We now have pending in the Banking and Currency Committee of the United States Senate that extraordinary bill, passed by an overwhelming vote in the other branch of Congress, to charge seven men of ordinary intelligence here in Washington with the incredible function of raising and lowering prices at their whim or pleasure or judgment, whereas God never created seven men who were capable of doing anything of the kind effectively, or to whom any sane legislative body should be willing to trust a power of that sort.

So we all know that inflation was "in the air," and still is. Yet because the technician of the subcommittee, entirely aside from his official employment and responsive to the requests of a French newspaper with which he had been associated for years, told the paper what everybody knew, or could find out if he did not know, of the tendency to inflation in this country, he is charged by the Senator from New Jersey with having obtained "confidential information" and imparted it to this French newspaper!

I challenge the Senator from New Jersey to point to one sentence in one of these garbled and mistranslated cables of Doctor Willis that justifies any such statement. I have already asserted that the Comptroller of the Currency utterly repudiates the suggestion that the technician of the committee or the committee itself obtained from his office any confidential information. I assert of my personal knowledge that neither the committee nor the technician of the committee ever received one word of information in confidence from any of the Federal reserve authorities which furnished basis for a single statement contained in the Willis cables to this French financial paper. On the contrary, the governor of the Federal Reserve Board told me months ago that when Mr. Laval, the French Finance Minister, was over here last October he had told him personally of the design of the French bank by degrees to withdraw its earmarked gold, impounded at the New York Federal Reserve Bank. The withdrawals began long before the Willis cables started.

And the Senator from New Jersey credits the current cablegrams of a French correspondent over here with having brought about this great withdrawal of gold! It is childish.

The thing that I resent, however, is the statement that an honorable man who never in his life was guilty of a discreditable thing, whose sense of propriety I would put in comparison with that of the Senator from New Jersey or any other Senator in this body, had used his relationship to this subcommittee for an illicit purpose. A statement of that sort made not behind the shelter of constitutional immunity would, in my belief, very promptly be met by suitable action, because it is not true.

But suppose it were true: What has that to do with the so-called Glass banking bill? Suppose we had been helped in our arduous and difficult labors by an intellectual knave instead of a highly honorable man: What would that have to do with the soundness or the unsoundness of the propositions embraced in the bill we have presented? The bill should be considered on its merits; its demerits, if any, rejected; and its sound provisions preserved and accepted by the Congress, in order to avert a repetition of this desperate situation that the gentlemen for whom the Senator from New Jersey spoke so unctuously precipitated upon the country by their irregular and cruel credit transactions.

I repeat what I said briefly yesterday: There is not a provision of this bill that the technician wrote which he was not directed as an expert draftsman by the committee to write after exhaustive consideration and discussion. Those provisions of a highly controversial nature I largely wrote; others were written or suggested by my colleagues; and we did not have to get the aid either of the Senator from New Jersey or the technician of the committee in order to prepare or propose such provisions.

Section 3, which disturbs the dreams of those who want again to use the facilities of the Federal reserve system for stock-gambling purposes, was written by the experts of the Federal Reserve Board. The committee did not dot an "i" nor cross a "t" in it.

Section 8, which even more seriously disturbs these gentlemen who want to use Federal reserve facilities for stock-gambling purposes, was written—every word of it—by me without suggestion from any source. I have had in mind for years to put a stop to this misuse of reserve credit facilities. This provision of the bill now under consideration by the Senate was contained substantively in the bill that I introduced in this body on the 27th of June, 1930, before the employment of Doctor Willis.

But here is the bill before the Senate. It ought not to be prejudiced by personal assaults upon innocent men of honor.

Therefore, Mr. President, I make this protest on my own account, and not at the request or suggestion of H. Parker Willis. He has no right to speak here or to call in question anything spoken here; but it is my right, which I gladly exercise, and my duty to repel the unprovoked and indefensible attack on him.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that H. R. 10236, an act to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, be laid before the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I am not going to withhold unanimous consent. The request of the Senator requires it.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. I am not going to withhold it, however.

I realize that the tax bill is a measure of tremendous importance. I wish the balance of the Senate could equally realize that this bank bill is a measure of great importance, because if it or something like it is not passed we are going to have another era of bank failures in this country pretty soon that will prevent any recovery that a tax bill or any other sort of bill may help to bring about.

Therefore, I am not going to object; but the request is that the bank bill may temporarily be laid aside, so that at the completion of the tax bill it will have its present status of unfinished business?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the understanding, Mr. President.

Mr. GLASS. I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10236. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska object to the request?

Mr. HOWELL. I wish to speak for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reserving the right to object, the Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, a very illuminating letter as to the conditions of agriculture was received by a Senator from a gentleman who had traveled throughout the northwestern part of this country, and I shall quote briefly in part from that letter:

> A typical illustration of a farmer's condition is as follows:
> He has a first mortgage on the farm. Often a second mortgage secures a local loan. The local banker will hold either a personal or crop loan note. Three to five machinery people have notes on file. In addition local merchants have open accounts for supplies, prices of which due to credit extended often run 25 to 50 per cent higher than cash prices. One instance I know of is of tractor gasoline billed at 35 cents, when the season's cash price was never over 20 cents.
> In cases where discouraged farmers have broached the subject of throwing up their whole business under such above handicaps certain first mortgage holders have suggested that the bankruptcy act could be taken advantage of; homestead and household exemptions, which can not legally be signed away, could be claimed. In the meantime the first mortgage owner would bid in the farm and lease it back to the original owner, the inference being that at a later date he could buy it back on easy terms. (One instance in Idaho I ran into was of two adjoining farms, only fairly well improved, on both of which an insurance company had loans. The latter foreclosed one mortgage of $4,000 and was offering the property at $3,500. The neighbor had a $4,000 loan also, along with a lot of other debts, and was seriously considering throwing up his place and buying in the adjoining land at $500 less than either mortgage.)
> * * * * * * *
> As to agricultural or farming conditions and plans:
> Due to relative scarcity of durum and spring wheat last year and very fair prices as a result mainly of drought and grasshoppers, I note a greatly increased intention to plant wheat in the Northwest. There will be a decrease in flax. In many other sections farmers are starting spring work in a disheartened and despondent state of mind. The potato men in the Yakima, Walla Walla, Idaho, Colorado, and Red River sections all are that way, yet they are planting potatoes again. Practically all fruits and vegetables were in oversupply last year, but crops of these are going in everywhere. Onions were the high-priced article of 1931, and farmers are almost universally responding to price and are plunging heavily on them. Seed is almost impossible to obtain, the demand is so great. I saw letters from Kalamazoo, Mich., in New Mexico wanting onion seed or plants. At a conference in Santa Fe, N. Mex., of western men we were told that the estimate is for 300,000 tons of canning peaches in California this year. Last year's canned storage is heavy, and canners will only contract 100,000 tons, so two-thirds of the crop is to be wasted. Numerous other crops are in the same situation.

Mr. President, this gives a short view of conditions, not merely in the sections visited by this writer but throughout the country generally.

I received a letter the other day from an attorney in Alabama which I will read in part. It gives a notion of the condition of minds of the people in that section which indicates that it is the same as elsewhere. He says in part:

> Now I have lived in a little sleepy town down here in the agricultural section of Alabama all my life. I have always taken an active interest in the welfare of our little city and county. I have seen the time when we were a prosperous, law-abiding citizenship, a contented people, as we were able to pay our debts, taxes, and contribute to churches and charity. But the times have changed, and we are now a discontented people, heavily in debt, and unable to pay taxes, contribute to the several causes that all good citizens like to support.
> There has been a reason for this change, and the result is that our people have in large measure lost their respect and love for our country that should animate all good citizens. Farm after farm is being taken for debt. Old people that have lived to a ripe old age are being driven from their homes, as they are unable to meet their interest payments. Their savings of a lifetime have been swept away; and now many of them are unable to provide the necessities of life.

Conditions as they now exist, not only here but throughout the entire country, are the culmination of policies political and touch the lives of every man, woman, and child of the Nation. What will be the result? This should concern every thinking man; for a discontented debt-ridden people soon lose that high regard for national welfare and love of country that should be cherished and guarded by the masses, who make the commonwealth.

This letter, Mr. President, should challenge attention. It indicates the impressions of a conservative man. He expressed himself as he felt, and as he deemed the people about him feel.

The question is, What will Congress do to relieve the situation? What will it do of a constructive character to rescue agriculture?

Notwithstanding that action by Congress is of such tremendous importance, I have noted a statement—indicating the impression abroad—appearing in the New York Journal of Commerce on May 11, under a summary entitled "The Washington Situation." It is to the effect that organized agriculture is demanding of Congress that it enact constructive farm legislation before adjournment, and the article closes with this:

Congress will not do so.

I consider this a challenge to Congress to repudiate this charge. I do not yet believe that the Members of the Senate or of the House have so little regard for the welfare of a third of the population of this country as to adjourn without attempting to do something to relieve the distressing situation in which agriculture is now placed, or to remedy the inequality in economic conditions and opportunities from which agriculture is suffering.

The statement in the Journal of Commerce misrepresents the situation in that it charges that the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, and the Farmers' Union "can not agree upon a single measure," and that each is demanding a separate proposal, although willing that all three be enacted. The fact is these three organizations have definitely agreed upon a joint program; they have presented a composite bill embodying their recommendations to both Agricultural Committees of the Senate and House.

The bill referred to is now before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, but we have no report as yet. I understand that hearings began this morning upon that and other measures before the committee. But what we must have is a report and a bill or bills upon the calendar of the Senate so that action may be had.

Can it be possible that it is in the minds of some that there shall be no agricultural legislation at this session? It has been asserted here on the floor that official Washington is against any kind of agricultural legislation.

Mr. President, as I have asked before time and again on this floor, What are we to say to the farmer if we adjourn without action? There is but one thing we can say, and that is that there has not been the will in Congress to act in behalf of agriculture in a constructive way.

Mr. President, agriculture must be rescued.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, May 13, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE

FRIDAY, MAY 13, 1932

(Legislative day of Monday, May 9, 1932)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. MOSES). The Senate will receive a message from the President of the United States.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS

Several messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On May 9, 1932:

S. 3908. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters," approved February 8, 1895.

On May 11, 1932:

S. 283. An act to provide for conveyance of a certain strip of land on Fenwick Island, Sussex County, State of Delaware, for roadway purposes.

INTERNATIONAL COLONIAL AND OVERSEAS EXPOSITION AT PARIS (S. DOC. NO. 94)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am forwarding, for the consideration of the Congress, a report of April 30, 1932, from the Acting Secretary of State transmitting the following documents in connection with the participation of this Government in an exposition which was held at Paris, France, in 1931, the preparation for and activities in connection with such participation having extended from 1930 to 1932:

I. Report of the commissioner general and the commissioner of the United States of America to the International Colonial and Overseas Exposition.

II. Financial statement of appropriations and expenditures in connection with the same.

III. Covering letter of April 30, 1932, from the commissioner general to the Secretary of State, accompanying the financial statement.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 13, 1932.

(Accompaniments: As listed.)

ISSUANCE OF BONDS BY ST. THOMAS HARBOR BOARD

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4193) to authorize the issuance of bonds by the St. Thomas Harbor Board, Virgin Islands, for the acquisition or construction of a graving or dry dock, which was, on page 2, line 3, after the word "payable," to insert "from the treasury of said board."

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE IN NAME OF THE ISLAND OF PORTO RICO

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 36) to change the name of the island of "Porto Rico" to "Puerto Rico," which was to strike out the preamble.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a resolution of Victory Post, No. 4, American Legion, Department of the District of Columbia, opposing "any effort by Congress to place upon Federal employees the burden of economy, necessitated by an era of false inflation, from which such employees derived no profit," and also opposing any discrimination against the employment of married men and women in the Government service, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLAINE presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Clark County, Wis., remonstrating against the passage of legislation providing for the closing of barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia or other restrictive religious measures, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DILL presented the petition of Miss Margaret Drisko and sundry other citizens of Seattle, Wash., praying for the passage of Senate bill 4436, to amend the tariff act of 1930, etc., relating to birth-control information, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented telegrams and letters in the nature of memorials from Tom Biggers, president Bank of Pocahontas, of Pocahontas; the Bank of Truman, of Truman; the Bank of Gould, of Gould; R. E. Lee Wilson, of Wilson; the Bank of Marvel, of Marvel; the Cotton Belt Bank & Trust Co., of Pine Bluff; B. L. Ross, of Helena; Mack Hall, of Heavener; A. T. He also presented a petition of employees of the Erie Railroad, of Nyack, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the establishment of a pension system for railroad and transportation employees, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Socialist Party of Rockland County, N. Y., protesting against the adoption of a manufacturers' sales tax, either general or specific, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted at an executive board meeting of the associated General Contractors of America at Washington, D. C., favoring the enactment of legislation appropriating $132,000,000 for Federal aid in highway construction, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Chappaqua, N. Y., praying for the passage of the so-called Federal relief bill for unemployment, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BARBOUR presented resolutions adopted by the Republican Club of Nutley, N. J., favoring the prompt passage of legislation known as the home loan bank bill, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a petition signed by Miss Sera Jeanne Arnold, president, and members of the Women's Society, Church of the Messiah, of Paterson, N. J., praying for the affording of protection to the reindeer herds in Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Pretty Brook Tennis Club, of Princeton, N. J., favoring the balancing of the Budget and retrenchment in governmental expenditures, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented memorials of Manalapan Grange, No. 190, of Englishtown; Moorestown Grange, No. 8, of Moorestown; and Wrightstown Grange, No. 147, of Wrightstown, all of the Patrons of Husbandry, in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the automobile industry, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Board of Education of Ridgewood, N. J., protesting against the passage of the so-called Oddie bill, being the bill (S. 4080) to regulate the manufacture and sale of stamped envelopes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPEAL OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. BARBOUR presented a telegram from William C. Fay, commander Department of New Jersey, Veterans of Foreign Wars, of West Englewood, N. J., which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WEST ENGLEWOOD, N. J., May 12, 1932.

United States Senator W. WARREN BARBOUR,
Washington, D. C.:

The tragic Lindbergh episode emphasizes the inability of organized government to combat enthroned viciousness. Let us have the courage to repeal the eighteenth amendment and restore respect for law and order.

WILLIAM C. FAY,
Commander Department of New Jersey,
Veterans of Foreign Wars.

DISABILITY ALLOWANCE TO WORLD WAR VETERANS

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, much propaganda is now making the rounds against former service men of various branches of the service, those who have worn the uniform. Most of this propaganda is unfair, a great deal of it vicious and entirely untrue. I shall have more to say on this question before the session adjourns. At present I shall content myself with simply submitting a statement in defense, to some degree, of the soldiers' attitude and the soldiers' position, prepared by Howard R. Hooper, of Indianapolis, Ind., which I ask may be incorporated in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

THE DISABILITY ALLOWANCE TO WORLD WAR VETERANS

In 1930 the Seventy-first Congress passed and the President signed an amendment to the World War veterans' act. This amendment granted to veterans of the World War who had served 90 days or more and were honorably discharged from the military service and were suffering with at the time of the passage of the bill and any time thereafter a permanent disability of 25 per cent or more, and which was not due to his willful misconduct, a disability allowance of $12 per month as a minimum, and of $40 per month as maximum amount.

The purpose or object of this amendment was not simply to pay a disability allowance or service pension to men suffering solely from disabilities acquired after they were discharged from the military service, but to compensate veterans who rendered to their country honest and faithful service during the World War, and acquired while rendering such services injuries and ailments that they can not connect with their military service.

Under the rules or laws of the Veterans' Bureau, and according to opinions of the Comptroller General, which rules and opinions are based on the World War veterans' act and amendments thereto, in order for a veteran to be entitled to disability compensation prior to enactment of the above law the veteran must prove that his disability occurred in the military service or was aggravated by his military service.

The method of making this proof was as follows:

A record of the injury or ailment on his service record or military medical history; affidavits of comrades to the effect that he was injured in the service or ill, giving time and place; an affidavit from the veteran stating the kind of illness or injury, the time and place, and what hospital, if any, he was sent to while in the service, and the name or names of the Army doctor or doctors who treated him. Affidavits from doctor or doctors who treated him within two years after he was discharged from the service, giving his or their diagnosis, prognosis, physical and laboratory findings, and that in his or their (the physician or physicians) opinion the injury or ailment is traceable to veteran's military service, and that it disabled the veteran 10 per cent or more.

The cases are legion in which there was no record made of the veteran's illness or injury while in the service. Due to the hurry and bustle in the cantonments, training camps, embarkation camps, on the transports, and in the camps, billets, and trenches in France no record was made or kept of these injuries or ailments.

In other cases the veteran was unable to locate comrades who knew of his military disability, hence he was unable to furnish affidavits from them as to his military disability. In other cases he could not remember the name of the Army doctor who treated him nor the hospital or its location where he was sent for treatment.

In still other cases the physician who treated him within two years after he was discharged from the military service had no record of his diagnosis and prognosis, and no record of his physical or laboratory findings, if he made any, hence he had nothing in his files on which he could predicate a statement or affidavit that the veteran's disability was traceable to his military service and that it disabled him 10 per cent or more.

It was to remedy this unfortunate circumstance that Congress passed the law granting a disability allowance to World War veterans. The Congress took the position that it was better that 99 unworthy claims for compensation be allowed than 1 worthy claim be disallowed due to the fact that the veteran could not comply with the law relative to making proof that his disability was service connected.

Former Sergeant B Company,
Three Hundred and Seventy-first Infantry.

STABILIZATION AND CONTROL OF MONETARY SYSTEM

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, in the May 6 issue of the Detroit News there was an able editorial which I believe should be read and considered carefully by every Senator; in fact it would be a healthy thing if every American citizen would read and consider it.

The views it expresses are much in accord with my own sentiments in regard to the need for stabilization and control of our monetary system in the public interest. I do not propose to discuss that subject myself at this time, but I do ask permission to print the editorial from the Detroit News in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Detroit News, May 6, 1932]

NOW WE ARE FACING THE FACTS

We venture to predict that when the history of the great depression comes to be written, May 2, 1932, the date on which the Goldsborough bill providing for a radical but governed inflation of the currency was presented to and passed by the House of Representatives, will be underscored as important in spite of President Hoover's scornful comment thereon. Its significance may not be due to the passage of the bill, as to the merits of which there are two and probably three opinions, but the report in which the Committee on Banking and Currency submitted it to the House is a landmark in official discussion of an economic stagnation.

Here is the arrestingly direct and lucid way in which the committee gives the first official recognition to the most menacing problem this Nation has to solve, the problem on whose solution the future of the Nation depends:

"All authorities agree, first, that it is impossible for the debts of the country to be paid at the present price level, and that unless the price level is raised the business of the country is headed for inevitable bankruptcy, and, second, that the present price level is unjust to debtors."

The truth of the statements which the report so boldly makes has been widely apparent for many months and will not surprise anyone who has been following the course of events—as who has not? It is not, then, the matter which is remarkable, but the fact that a governmental body gives it utterance, and that fact, far from disquieting the American public mind, should breed a new confidence and optimism, born of the knowledge that at last Washington is looking conditions squarely in the face and is no longer unready to deal with them.

"The psychological effect of debt, both upon individuals and nations, is disastrous," said Senator KING not long ago. "It often results in individual despair and national disturbances." It is conservatively estimated that to-day debts in the United States amount to over $150,000,000,000, of which nearly a third are governmental. All but a negligible portion of these debts were incurred when money was easy, prices high, and business booming. Now, with money tight, commodity, security, and property values constantly hitting new lows, and business and industry crippled, it is plain, as the committee says, "that it is impossible for the debts of the country to be paid." The hopeless burden which they impose is paralyzing individual initiative and breaking down the financial and industrial structure of the country. The restoration of the former balance between debts and values is the remedy.

The fact that it should have been left for a House committee to formulate the first official statement of the gravity of the situation requires an explanation. In the first place, the administration and Congress have been intent on strengthening the parts of the financial organization which bore the brunt of the collapse, and this they have well done by means of such measures as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Glass-Steagall bill. In the second place, both the executive and legislative branches of the Government depend for financial counsel on the able officials of the Treasury Department and of the reserve banking system, who quite naturally are imbued with the banker or creditor viewpoint. This viewpoint is that the monetary system is in the particular charge of the Federal reserve system, and that to seek causes for general business depression in some fault in that system is merely to beg the question. Under these circumstances there is small cause for wonder that many difficulties had to be dealt with before the key log in the economic jam could be tackled.

But now that the problem has been frankly stated and a determination expressed to deal with it, there is better ground for intelligent hope for its adequate solution than at any time in the last two years. That does not mean that the authors of the Goldsborough bill, among whom Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale University, is said to be the leader, have hit upon the best or even a practical answer, but it does mean that some of our leaders now see clearly the target toward which they must aim. That is our most substantial gain to date, and we must trust to sound American sense and the sound American political system to produce a bolt and a marksman that will hit the bull's-eye in the middle. When that bolt rings the bell it will sound the knell for the most menacing phase of any depression.

An intensive study of the major depressions or panics through which this country has passed since its birth reveals the significant fact that each of these depressions or panics has served to gather a greater and still greater proportion of the national wealth into the hands of a smaller and ever smaller group of our citizens. The citizen who, previous to one of these depressions, assumed an obligation which he then could pay with 100 days' labor found after the depression had set in he could pay it only with 200 or 300 or 400 days' labor. Naturally, then, wholesale foreclosures followed, and another army of property owners became citizens without property.

The process is a menace to the safety of our country. A fool should perceive that. And the danger is enhanced by the demonstrable fact that each of our major depressions has carried down a constantly growing proportion of our people. How many more depressions it will take to reach the breaking point no man can say. It may be a good many. But that is beside the point. When we absolutely know the rapids are below us it is the part of ordinary wisdom to take steps before the boat is carried into them.

We would not be understood as having lost faith in our Federal reserve system. That has done grand work for the Nation. It has shown us that it can control and check a minor depression which, under the old system, probably would have developed into a major depression. Which encourages us to believe that the able men at the head of the Federal reserve, when asked by Congress to concentrate upon the subject with full knowledge and belief that the fate of the Nation is at stake, can devise a workable method of controlling a major depression also; can make a reasonable balance between debts and values secure.

And when that is done you can trust the American people to reap for themselves that wider dissemination of property which, with our liberties, forms the keystone of our national security and safety.

TAXING DISPATCHES AND SECOND-CLASS MAIL

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Newark Evening News advocating an increased tax on second-class mail matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

TAXING DISPATCHES AND SECOND-CLASS MAIL

In its search for new revenue the Senate Finance Committee favors higher second-class mail rates and proposes fresh taxes on the transmission of news, such as leased wires, telegrams, telephone messages, cablegrams, and radiograms.

The attitude of this newspaper toward increased postal rates was stated some time ago. In July, 1929, when President Hoover advocated making the Post Office Department pay its own way, the News said:

"It is said that if the President were to carry out his idea of regarding the post office as a business institution, with the cost of each class of service borne by those who receive the benefits, he would incur the opposition of every newspaper and magazine in the country. This newspaper would not object. It knows no reason why the public should be taxed to pay its postage bills, any more than its telephone, telegraph, and cable bills."

The Senate Finance Committee has voted to go back to the schedule of second-class postal rates of 1921. Postmaster General Brown advocates the more reasonable rates of 1925, which he estimates would bring in about the same additional revenue. The Post Office Department should know better than anyone else. The Post Office Department faces a deficit. If it is convinced that one way to meet this deficit is by increasing the second-class rates, its wisdom should be deferred to and the newspapers and magazines should bear the cost of the service furnished them.

With an institution that relies so much on instantaneous transmission of the news as the newspapers, the transmission taxes would be a heavy item. The newspapers are no more anxious to take this tax than gas consumers want to bear the burden of additional taxes on gasoline or any other business to bear the burden on what affects it directly. But the same rule applies here as to all other taxes. If Washington can demonstrate that the proposed transmission taxes are equitable, they come under the head of things that must be done. There can be no enthusiasm about it, because it would put a heavy burden on a product that is sold very cheaply. Still the tax problem can not be solved if everyone is to plead inability to stand the gaff. The newspapers and the magazines must carry their share of the load.

FEDERAL AID TO CITIES

Mr. VANDENBERG presented resolutions adopted by the Common Council of the city of Detroit, Mich., which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution adopted by the Common Council of the city of Detroit, May 10, 1932

By Councilman Castator

Whereas the city of Detroit will from time to time during the next fiscal year find it necessary to borrow money against uncollected general city taxes or its revenue appropriations for the purpose of meeting its current requirements and maintaining its governmental functions; and

Whereas the city plans to refund bonds or other obligations in connection with its next year's fiscal program and has also been given authority by act of the legislature passed at the special session just closed to issue additional emergency bonds; and

Whereas the banks of Detroit have loaned to the city the amount of their legal requirements and it has been necessary from time to time for the city to negotiate with New York banks and private industries for its financial accommodations, but there is not assurance that said sources of loans will be available when further money is required; and

Whereas present economic conditions may continue for a considerable period and it may become necessary for the city of Detroit to find new sources from which it may borrow money on its faith and credit obligations to meet the above requirements; and

Whereas the United States Congress has enacted legislation enabling the Government to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry including extension of credits to railroads, banks, trust companies, insurance companies, and other financial institutions, and similar relief is now under consideration by President Hoover so as to empower the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to extend credit to municipalities of the country, either for public welfare relief or such other purposes as would be provided by law, by the purchase of notes, debentures, bonds, or other faith and credit obligations of cities, the effect of which legislation would be to improve the municipal bond market, reduce the rates of interest which municipalities may have to pay and stabilize municipal investments now outstanding in the hands of the public and to provide for the public emergency which cities throughout the country are confronted with: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the two Senators from the State of Michigan and the Representatives from the city of Detroit be respectfully requested to urge an amendment to the congressional act incorporating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or such other legislation as may be finally determined advisable to permit such corporation to invest its assets in notes, debentures, bonds, or other faith and credit obligations of cities in such amounts and for such public welfare or other necessary purposes as may be provided by such amendment, and that such Senators and Representatives use their best efforts in having said legislation passed and enacted as expeditiously as possible; and be it further

Resolved, That the city clerk be requested to forward a copy of this resolution to Senator JAMES COUZENS, Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, Representative CLARENCE J. MCLEOD, Representative ROBERT H. CLANCY, Representative SEYMOUR H. PERSON, and Representative EARL C. MICHENER; and be it further

Resolved, That the president of the common council be, and he is hereby, requested to appoint a committee consisting of two members of the common council, including the president, the corporation counsel, and the controller to confer with said Senators, Representatives, and other persons in authority for the purpose of carrying this resolution.

Adopted as follows:

Yeas: Councilmen Castator, Hall, Jeffries, Lindsay, Lodge, Smith, Van Antwerp, and the president—8.

Nays: None.

RECONSIDERATION

Councilman Castator moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

Councilman Lodge moved to suspend rule 23 for the purpose of indefinitely postponing the motion to reconsider, which motion prevailed, as follows:

Adopted as follows:

Yeas: Councilmen Castator, Hall, Jeffries, Lindsay, Lodge, Smith, Van Antwerp, and the president—8.

Nays: None.

Councilman Lindsay then moved that the motion to reconsider be indefinitely postponed, which motion prevailed.

The regular order was resumed.

ADMISSIONS TAX—EXEMPTION ON THEATER TICKETS

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I present numerous petitions signed by nearly 9,000 citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, praying for a 46-cent exemption on theater admission tickets.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will be received and lie on the table.

THE OHIO PRIMARY ELECTION—PROHIBITION

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, at the primary election held in Ohio this week the voters of that State spoke in no uncertain terms on the question of prohibition. I do not want to detain the Senate with a discussion of that subject at this time, but I ask to have incorporated at this point in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, a summary of the vote from the Cleveland Plain Dealer; also editorial opinions from the Cleveland Plain Dealer, the Cincinnati Enquirer, the Ohio State Journal, of Columbus, the Columbus Dispatch, the Akron Beacon-Journal, the Dayton News, and the Scripps-Howard newspapers of Ohio.

There being no objection, the articles referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer]

Antiprohibition candidates on both Republican and Democratic tickets were swept to victory in yesterday's primaries by majorities undreamed of in Ohio, birthplace and "cradle" of the Anti-Saloon League and battle ground which witnessed that organization's major triumphs in the last two decades.

Not one candidate for an important State office indorsed by the dry organization survived; this includes governorship, senatorship, and Congressman at large.

That the result of yesterday's primary election will be interpreted as a mandate to both national conventions to write liberal planks into their platforms is by no means unlikely. The voice raised in such certain terms by this pivotal State is not likely to go unheeded.

BETTMAN'S LEAD 52,000

The extent of the antiprohibitionist triumph is best gaged by the annihilating defeat administered by Attorney General Gilbert Bettman to Louis J. Taber, national master of the Grange, in the Republican senatorial contest.

Returns from 8,618 precincts out of a total of 8,701, as compiled by the Associated Press, gave Bettman a lead of 52,322.

In this contest prohibition was singled out as almost the sole issue. Anti-Saloon League leaders and employees went solidly back of the Taber candidacy with one of the old-time appeals to Protestant clergymen to organize their forces and "fight to the death."

Yet out of 557,230 votes cast in these precincts in the senatorial fight, only 198,192 went to the one dry candidate; the others were distributed among Bettman, Mayor Jacob S. Coxey, of Massillon, and Charles A. Bracher, of Dayton (both classed as liberals), and Mrs. Elizabeth C. T. Miller, of Cleveland, who also was not sanctified by Anti-Saloon League approval.

In a somewhat less striking degree, the story of the antiprohibitionist victory was written into the gubernatorial primary contests in both parties.

DOOMED BY "SATISFACTORY"

David S. Ingalls, of Cleveland, striking young Navy World War ace and now Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Aeronautics, zoomed into a spectacular victory over two powerful opponents and veterans of many a political battlefield, Secretary of State Clarence J. Brown and former Gov. Myers Y. Cooper.

Ingalls, taking off on his first state-wide political flight in Ohio, piloted his craft against prohibition evils and held to his course.

Brown and Cooper were, it turned out, grounded by Anti-Saloon League officials, who pronounced against them their verdict of "satisfactory."

In 8,645 precincts tabulated by the Associated Press Ingalls had a lead of 27,852 over Brown, his nearest competitor, and a lead of 57,480 over Cooper, in whose behalf three clergymen sent out letters urging that he be nominated.

A third liberal candidate, Charles C. B. Beatty, pottery salesman of East Liverpool, wholly lacking in organization support, polled 12,168 votes.

Republican voters selected Assistant Attorney General Thomas J. Herbert and former State Senator George H. Bender, both of Cleveland.

In this contest, with seven in the field, there was only one candidate indorsed by the Anti-Saloon League, Rev. B. F. Reading, of Toledo.

In 8,502 precincts tabulated by the Associated Press Reverend Mr. Reading ran 36,060 votes behind Bender, who led the ticket and who, as a militant enemy of the league, was instrumental in bringing about the referendum on the Marshall bill, aimed at restoration of commercialized justice fine and fee splitting courts after they had been outlawed by the United States Supreme Court.

Reverend Mr. Reading ran fourth. Out of 751,668 votes cast in this contest he received only 113,229 votes, the rest going to his liberal opponents.

The Democratic contest for congressman at large was not far different. Of the 11 candidates the league indorsed only 1, Charles E. Lukens, of Marion, and he ran ninth in the precincts so far tabulated, or 69,539 behind the leader, Stephen M. Young, of Cleveland, and 53,155 behind former Director of Agriculture Charles V. Truax, who won second place on the ticket.

LIBERALS IN STATE HOUSE RACE

Thus Ohio made its voice heard—the election fight for the governorship will be between two liberals, Governor White and Ingalls; Bettman, antiprohibitionist, will be opposed by Senator ROBERT J. BULKLEY, of Cleveland, who was elected two years ago against the dry former Senator Roscoe C. McCulloch on a platform demanding modification and repeal, and two liberal Republican candidates for congressman at large will battle it out with two equally liberal Democratic opponents.

Plain Dealer, Cleveland (independent Democrat):

"We do not know to what degree the political eye of the Nation was on Ohio Tuesday. But if the national political sharps are looking our way they will find several interesting things to set down in their little books.

"'Ohio in this primary gives the message to the Nation,' said the appeal which leaders in three churches sent to their pastors just before the primary, urging the nomination of Louis J. Taber for Senator on the Republican ticket, and seeking to switch dry votes from Clarence J. Brown to Myers Y. Cooper in the Republican gubernatorial primary.

"That message is now more than plain. Ohio is no longer a dry State.

"The leading strings of the Anti-Saloon League, so powerful in the days of the late Wayne B. Wheeler, now pull candidates to defeat. Those 'unsatisfactory' to the league did better on the average than those thrice-blessed at Westerville.

"The extraordinary achievement of David S. Ingalls was greatly helped by the political blunder of those dry leaders who thought an eleventh-hour desertion of Brown in favor of Cooper would help their own cause. Instead they killed what slight chance they may have had to stop a Republican nominee whose frank stand against prohibition is a refreshing contrast to the murky hypocrisy which has too often marked this issue in Ohio."

The Enquirer, Cincinnati (independent Democrat):

"One single fact dominates the results of the primary election in Ohio—the people of the State have spoken unequivocally for modification of the prohibition laws. There is no mistaking the meaning of the tremendous vote cast for Gilbert Bettman, running against an avowed dry. This was the clearest test of liquor sentiment in many years and * * * makes plain that reform of the prohibition law is imperatively demanded in Ohio. This conclusion is supported by the success of David S. Ingalls and the large complimentary vote given to Senator ROBERT J. BULKLEY, both of them uncompromising advocates of modification.

"The wide distribution of liberal sentiment shows that modification sentiment is not confined to urban areas. From the Bettman victory it is apparent that the one-time power of the Anti-Saloon League in the Republican Party in Ohio is completely shattered.

"From now on the G. O. P. can approach this all-important social problem in the light of what men and women actually demand. The Ohio primary is a turning point in this nationally important problem."

State Journal, Columbus (Republican):

"When Ohio voted dry in 1918 everybody knew it was only a question of time until nearly every State would capitulate. Since Ohio has gone wet again everybody knows it is only a question of time until national prohibition will be abolished—in letter as well as in already established fact. If any doubt has existed up to this time whether the Republican Party platform, to be adopted next month, will contain a wet plank, that question has been ended by Tuesday's vote.

"So far as the State is concerned, the result in November will be wet, no matter which party is the victor."

The Dispatch, Columbus (independent):

"In this most significant of Ohio primary elections in years, from the national political standpoint, one trend seems to be definitely established. It is that a marked change in sentiment concerning the virtue of the dry cause has occurred among Ohio voters.

"In the national Republican Party especially is this important. It has been awaiting the outcome of the Ohio vote, which admittedly is accounted the most revealing in any of the 48 States because of Ohio's history as a political pace setter, and undoubtedly it will have an effect upon the position which the national convention and the national candidates will take on this question during the election."

Beacon-Journal, Akron (Republican):

"There need be no surprise that David S. Ingalls has won the Republican nomination for governor by a decisive vote, so decisive as to be the outstanding feature of the State primary. His victory carries a moral that should not be lost upon the faint-hearted candidates who imagine that to win high public station it is still in order to mortgage themselves to a decadent Anti-Saloon League leadership, along with the abject subversion of their own opinions and principles.

"Hardly less significant is the popular indorsement accorded Attorney General Gilbert Bettman in the senatorial race. Like Ingalls, Bettman gave defiance to the chieftains of Westerville, and told them bluntly that the hour has come when they should cease troubling the political counsels of the State. This challenge was accepted and the Anti-Saloon League put Louis J. Taber, head of the National Grange, as its champion in the arena. In no election has a contest been more clearly drawn than in this issue between Bettman and Taber. The result is a clear-cut expression of Ohio's sentiment in the matter."

The News, Dayton (Democrat):

"The sensation of the State-wide primary is the success of Republican antiprohibition candidates for both governor and United States Senator. This means nothing less than a political revolution in Ohio. From a time to which few present memories run, the Republican Party in Ohio has been controlled by a combination of interests of which the Anti-Saloon League was one. Men like Governor Cooper, Senator FESS, and the leaders who preceded them are and were official spokesmen in Ohio and in Congress for the powerful, hard-boiled political machine which Wayne Wheeler was able to build. When that whip cracked, the Republican Party jumped. Now at last that whip has cracked and the party has not responded. The party of Willis and FESS has turned about in following Bettman and Ingalls, open and energetic wets. Ohio, keystone of Anti-Saloon League power, is left without an Anti-Saloon League party. The Republican Party, pride of the drys, has gone wet. The political consequences, in Ohio, of this revolutionary change can not fail to be great."

Scripps-Howard Ohio newspapers:

"Wet victories in the Ohio and Indiana primaries hasten the national march away from prohibition. Ohio, the mother of Presidents and mother of the Anti-Saloon League, is a key State. Indiana is the State that had the most drastic dry laws.

"This general reaction against an experiment which started with noble purpose and ended ignobly is now barbed with sharp economic necessity. Prohibition enforcement swells the Federal deficit and at the same time robs the Government of revenue with which to balance the Budget and relieve the overburdened taxpayer.

Those hit by the tax bill are now asking to be spared. The movies, the rubber industry, the automobile industry, the insurance companies—the whole long list.

"And make no mistake about it, they are hit, and hit hard—at a time when any extra expense whatsoever is an inch off the end of the nose.

"Life or death for many of the industries is in the provisions of the tax bill; life if the tax is only all that the traffic will bear; the death sentence if beyond that. And the death means to the Government that the goose that lays the golden egg is no more, that the thing the bill seeks to accomplish is nullified by the bill itself. So it is no more than natural and human that cries for mercy are raised.

"And while all this is going on, the thing which would relieve all, the thing which would save industry from being taxed to death, lies before us—unused.

"Congress, the Congress which is doing the taxing, has the power to amend the Volstead Act. By such an amendment a tax on beer can be levied. And by such a tax the terrible burden could be lightened, could be shifted to shoulders that could bear it—shoulders that now go unencumbered with any load whatsoever.

"A beer tax would bring in from $375,000,000 to $500,000,000 per year. Think what that would do! It is a greater sum than the present proposed taxes on amusements, radios, and phonographs, and communications combined. It is from one-third to one-half the total tax bill.

"What a silly situation!

"Prohibition is doomed. Every sign points to that fact. As sure as the stars, prohibition is on the way out. Every politician in Washington knows it. It's only a matter of time. In what amounts to a stampede, the political drys are turning wet.

"What an opportunity to do it now—now, when the awful pressure of taxation can be relieved—not later, when the death sentence on overtaxed Americans has been executed.

"Those industries which are now crying for help have stockholders. Those stockholders are voters. We advise the ones who are now lobbying in Washington to get their companies spared, to go to the grass roots—to call upon their stockholders to express themselves to their Congressmen and their Senators.

"Amendment of the Volstead Act by this Congress would turn the trick. It would clear the skies. It isn't being done because the wary politicians are waiting for the party conventions next month to take the responsibility for something that is as inevitable as to-morrow.

"But pressure from back home might change their minds. The politician, admitting that prohibition is doomed, contends that it 'can't be done in this session.' He can be made to understand that anything is possible in a time like this."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11337) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange the Federal building site in Dover, N. J., for another site, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 685) thereon.

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (S. 36) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3691) to provide for the manufacture and sale of industrial and beverage alcohol for lawful purposes in Osage County, Okla., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 686) thereon.

Mr. SCHALL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8393) providing for payment of $25 to each enrolled Chippewa Indian of the Red Lake Band of Minnesota from the timber funds standing to their credit in the Treasury of the United States, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 687) thereon.

Mr. AUSTIN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 3532) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to readjust and close streets, roads, highways, or alleys in the District of Columbia rendered useless or unnecessary, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 688) thereon.

Mr. TYDINGS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 2178) to exempt from taxation certain property of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution in Washington, D. C., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 689) thereon.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

Mr. REED, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Brig. Gen. Edgar Thomas Collins, to be major general in the Regular Army, from June 1, 1932, vice Maj. Gen. John L. Hines, to be retired from active service May 31, 1932; and also sundry nominations of officers in the Regular Army, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably sundry nominations of postmasters, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

On page 36, strike out lines 16 to 23, both inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(c) In the case of a single person, a personal exemption of $1,000; or in the case of the head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife, a personal exemption of $2,500, unless the net income is in excess of $5,000, in which case the personal exemption shall be $2,000. A husband and wife living together shall receive but one personal exemption. The amount of such personal exemption shall be $2,500, unless the aggregate net income of such husband and wife is in excess of $5,000, in which case the amount of such personal exemption shall be $2,000. If such husband and wife make separate returns, the personal exemption may be taken by either or divided between them. In no case shall the reduction of the personal exemption from $2,500 to $2,000 operate to increase the tax, which would be payable if the exemption were $2,500, by more than the amount of the net income in excess of $5,000."

On page 37, strike out lines 14 to 24, both inclusive, and all of page 38 (being the earned-income provisions).

CONFIRMATION OF COAST GUARD NOMINATIONS

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the rule by which two executive session days must elapse before confirmations became final be waived in respect to certain Coast Guard nominations which recently were confirmed at the last executive session of the Senate. I make this request because it is an emergent matter. The young men have graduated and their closing exercises are set for Monday next. It was assumed that then they would receive their commissions and their appointments. If we do not waive the rule, the entire program that has been arranged for Monday next will be utterly and wholly displaced. I therefore ask that the rule may be waived.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think all the Senator need do would be to ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of the nominations.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am willing to adopt whichever method will accomplish the purpose; and, at the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska, I ask unanimous consent that the President may be notified of the confirmation of the Coast Guard nominations which were acted upon by the Senate at its last executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and, as in executive session, that order will be entered.

GOVERNMENT AND TAXES—ADDRESS BY FREDERICK E. WILLIAMSON

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix a radio address delivered by Mr. Frederick E. Williamson, president of the New York Central Lines, on Wednesday, April 20, 1932, on the subject Government and Taxes—Everybody's Business.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As a people we are born optimists. We earn more, spend more, and enjoy more than any civilized people in the world. We boast of our national wealth, but we ignore the fact that it represents only the savings of the people. We are proud of our national income, but we forget that it can never be more than the aggregate of individual income.

We concede that government now constitutes the country's greatest business, but we refuse to admit that we are stockholders in the business of government and that we are responsible for the conduct of that business. We find it much more convenient to neglect government, and we do neglect it.

We are most particular in the selection of a new motor car, a radio, or an overcoat; but we give little thought, excepting at or about election day, to the selection of our Government. As a matter of fact, we do not want to be bothered with the details of government unless we think it can do something for us which will give us an advantage over our neighbor. In that event, we are willing to bestir ourselves and we promptly call upon government to satisfy what has become commonly known as "public demand."

Government is always ready to respond to any demand which can possibly be construed as public demand and, during the recent years, "public demand" has become the theme song of our national life. The Federal, State, and local governments have listened to the music, and have intensified their efforts to please the people.

As a result governmental acitvities have continued to expand in every direction. We now find Government engaged in all kinds of business and in direct competition with its citizens. When government enters business it becomes a monopoly, and no private industry can successfully compete with it. Moreover, the business ventures of government are usually conducted at a loss, and these losses are paid from the public tax chest, to which the citizens themselves are required to contribute.

The past decade embraced years of unparalleled prosperity. Our volume of business expanded, values increased enormously, and business generally was profitable. But in spite of these facts, thoughtful citizens constantly directed attention to the rapid expansion of government and the continuously increasing tax burden. But these efforts enlisted little support. The Government was rich; it could do anything; the governmental Santa Claus was on the job.

Huge sums of public tax funds were appropriated and bonds were issued freely for all manner of public improvements—improvements which it was thought were needed, improvements which some one thought might be used sometime in the future, and improvements which nobody needed or would ever need. Millions of tax funds were allocated for every character of service and relief—relief for this, relief for that, and relief for the other thing—largely upon the popular theory that it would not cost anybody anything.

New Government agencies were created to spend the money and new bureaus to supervise the expenditures. Commissions were established to regulate everything and everybody. But there was apparently no thought that all of these things actually cost money; that there would be a day of reckoning; and that the people themselves would be called upon to pay the bill.

Pay day is here—and pay day is to-day. Many of the governmental units throughout the land are now facing enormous cash deficits and some of them are on the verge of actual bankruptcy. How many people realize that in 1919, the year following the armistice, total taxes collected in the United States amounted to seven and one-half billion dollars; that while there was a slight reduction to seven and one-quarter billion dollars in 1923, from then on, beginning at a point five years after peace, our tax bill has been constantly increasing. It was nearly ten billions in 1929 and is over ten billions at the present time. In fact, the total public expenditures for 1930 exceeded $14,000,000,000, the difference being represented by a $4,000,000,000 addition to our public debt of thirty billions. Government budgets must be balanced, and the public credit must be maintained. Government is now looking for a public which is willing to pay for the services which Government provided in response to what Government considered to be a public demand.

At the same time, we are passing through a recession in business which for length and severity is possibly without a parallel in history. Profits of agriculture and industry have almost vanished, and they naturally yield much less tax. The income of the individual has been greatly reduced, if it has not entirely disappeared, and he finds it difficult to pay any tax. We have reached the point, to quote from a recent address by Col. Robert R. McCormick, editor and publisher of the Chicago Tribune, where—

"The evil talk of tax strikes is heard throughout the land; but far more serious than strikes is the growing inability of taxpayers to pay. Strike or no strike, it is absolutely impossible to pay the taxes assessed. Owners of buildings are tearing them down because taxes are more than receipts. Owners of unimproved property are unable to pay their taxes and tax buyers can not be found to evict them. We have reached the extraordinary situation where the ownership of property has become a liability, not an asset."

The man who does not make a tax return, or who does not directly pay taxes, may think that he is exempt from taxation—but he is not. Every citizen, whether he knows it or not, pays taxes. There is no way of evading the tax collector—he finally gets everybody. Taxes are added to the cost of everything we purchase—bread, meat, flour, clothing, fuel, light, rent, and even transportation.

We are apt to point with pride to the fact that the railways, which have contributed so much to the universal welfare, constitute the country's largest corporate taxpayer. In reality, we have merely made the railway industry our largest tax collector.

The railways not only pay real-estate taxes, as do the farmer and the home owner, but they pay more. They pay excise taxes for the privilege of doing business. In many States they pay capital-stock taxes. In some States they pay taxes upon their gross revenues. In at least one State they pay taxes for the privilege of running their tracks across public highways. And, of course, they pay a Federal income tax—when they have any income.

The railways pay these taxes from freight rates and passenger fares which they receive from the public who use rail service. Every time you pay $10 for railway freight or passenger service, you contribute about 75 cents to the cost of government. You pay it to the railways when you purchase a ticket or pay a freight bill, and the railways turn it over to government when they pay their tax bills.

The power to tax is the most important privilege conferred upon government by the people. The proper use of the taxing power is a condition precedent to the prosperity of any country. The abuse of taxing power can destroy even the richest of nations. We should always remember that government itself is not obliged to earn money. Government has the power to collect money from those who do earn it.

When unfair or excessive taxation draws upon the national wealth, our productive ability becomes impaired. Agriculture and industry are compelled to curtail business operations, with resultant unemployment, thinner pay envelopes, and reduced purchasing power. Every dollar of unnecessary or excessive tax, which government takes from the earnings and income of the people, reduces the amount which citizens will be able to spend for goods and services, or for the employment of labor.

It is no longer necessary to point out that the cost of government is now beyond the ability of the people to pay. A business depression has brought that fact home with brutal force. Government has now become a $14,000,000,000 annual expense, and we face a staggering public debt and a back-breaking tax burden. We know where we are to-day, but we must now determine where we are going to-morrow.

If we are to have sound and lasting prosperity in this country, Government must stop looking for new places to spend more money and to levy additional taxes. Government must reduce expenses, and by this I do not mean merely reducing salaries of Government officers and employees; I mean that the only practical way to reduce Government expenses is to curtail governmental activities. We must call a halt upon every extravagance in government which produces excessive taxation, and which compels hand-to-mouth public borrowing. We must get down to hard-pan in the business of government.

Let the Government retire from all business which can and should be conducted by its citizens engaged in industrial enterprise. All commissions, bureaus, and governmental "what nots" which are not actually essential to the public welfare should be abolished. The people should cease their demands upon Government for all kinds of service and for all sorts of fads and fancies—at public expense. We must learn to be satisfied with less, or we must provide it ourselves. Expenditures for public improvements should be based solely upon the absolute need for them, and upon our ability to pay for them.

Everyone knows that reducing expenses is a painful job. But agriculture and industry have been compelled to pare expenses to the very bone of their operations, and the process has been more than painful. The individual citizen has not only felt the pinch, but he has economized until it actually hurts. But what is more important is the fact that these pains will become permanent aches unless government is willing to adopt the same drastic economies which have been forced upon its people.

Some people do not care much what happens as long as it does not happen to them. But government and taxes affect everybody, and everybody is to-day in need of the relief which could readily be provided, through less government and reduced taxes.

What the country needs is relief from governmental meddling with its citizens and with their lawful business pursuits.

What we all need, and need immediately, is relief from a tax burden which now has a strangle hold upon agriculture and industry, and which is actually confiscating the savings and the earnings of the home owner and the wage earner.

If the people really desire economy in government and a tax bill, which they can afford to pay, they can have it. But only if they make their desires known to those who represent them in the conduct of government. Citizens must be sure that their desires are clearly heard and that they are definitely understood. They must see that their wishes are respected.

Within the past few days we learn, through the public press, that an effort is being made to reduce the cost of our Federal Government. This is a move in the right direction. Whether these reductions will be sufficient to give new life to agriculture and industry is for the people and their representatives to determine. If the people really intend to show a proper interest in government, they should now let their representatives know how they feel with regard to the program which has been proposed and with regard to any programs which may be advanced in the future.

Furthermore, we must assume more responsibility for the conduct of a government which is in fact our Government. We must recognize that government and taxes are inseparable, and that they are determining factors in our national life. Government and taxes are and they should always be—everybody's business.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I see in the report on the bill now under consideration some very important figures relative to the revenue which it is estimated will result from the income-tax features of the bill, if enacted. I want to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in charge of the bill, whether the amount of revenue which it is expected will be produced from each bracket is given in the report? I notice the amount which the individual taxpayer will pay is given, but I do not find anywhere the aggregate amount in each bracket.

Mr. SMOOT. We have the figures as to the aggregate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will they be supplied?

Mr. SMOOT. I shall call attention to them in my remarks. I will say, however, that the aggregate revenue, taking the bill as a whole, will be $1,030,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I see that the aggregate is given.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator desires the aggregate in each of the brackets.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In each bracket.

Mr. SMOOT. I will see if that can not be supplied.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, may be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is imposed upon us the all-important duty of taking immediate and adequate steps to place the finances of the Government upon an unquestioned sound basis and to provide for the continuance of the public credit unimpaired. This is a problem of by no means merely fiscal implications, which may be thought of simply in terms of increasing the Federal revenues and decreasing its expenditures. It involves an issue of vastly greater significance, upon which economic conditions in the period which lies immediately before us must depend in very considerable measure. The course which the Congress pursues in dealing with this problem will inevitably affect the welfare of every man and woman in the country.

I need not recount the facts of the depression through which we have been passing during the past two and a half years. The extent of contraction in our industrial and commercial activity and of the decline in commodity and security prices—in fact, values in general—and the drastic credit liquidation which has taken place, the unemployment and the suffering of past months, should be all too fully evident to require description at this time. It is becoming increasingly apparent that this, the most severe depression in the country's history, has reached a stage in which doubt and uncertainty are obstructing the processes of rehabilitation and recovery which the wealth of our resources and the industry and enterprise of our people assure us. There is, furthermore, little doubt that an important contributing factor in this situation, particularly in recent months, has been the concern which has been aroused by the occurrence of heavy deficits in the Federal Budget and by the prospect of further large deficits unless corrective measures are immediately taken.

THE FEDERAL DEFICITS

We closed the fiscal year 1931 with a deficit of slightly more than $900,000,000. Of this amount, $440,000,000 was attributable to sinking fund and other statutory debt retirements. The balance of that deficit, plus an increase of $153,000,000 in the Treasury's general fund, accounted for a net increase in the gross public debt outstanding of $616,000,000. From point of view of the funds which the market was called upon to loan to the Government, there should be added to the net increase of $616,000,000 in the public debt the net amount of $507,000,000, representing additional Treasury borrowing required to convert securities held in the adjusted-certificate fund into cash in order to provide in part for additional loans to veterans. This makes a total increase in the volume of Federal borrowing in the open market in the fiscal year 1931 of more than $1,120,000,000.

Treasury estimates indicate for the current fiscal year—namely, 1932—a deficit aggregating $2,240,000,000, exclusive of additional amounts required to carry out the Government's reconstruction program. Subtracting from this figure $412,000,000 for statutory debt retirements included in expenditures, and adding $625,000,000 for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and for increases in the capital of Federal land banks, indicates a net increase in the public debt outstanding of not less than $2,450,000,000 for 1932. Again, to obtain the indicated volume of borrowing in the open market, it is necessary to increase this total by the amount of additional securities liquidated in connection with the financing of loans to veterans, which brings the indicated total volume of Federal borrowing in the open market for the fiscal year 1932 to not less than $2,575,000,000.

Thus the Treasury has been called upon to finance through borrowing a deficit of about $900,000,000 for the fiscal year 1931 and a deficit for the fiscal year 1932, which by the end of April had actually reached a total of more than $2,300,000,000.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEBERT in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HULL. I could not hear from where I am sitting whether or not the Senator referred to the status of the sinking fund in that connection.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not referred to it as yet, but I will reach that before I conclude.

Mr. HULL. Very well.

DECLINE IN REVENUES

Mr. SMOOT. The deficits are to be attributed in the main to the drastic reduction of the Federal revenues as a result of the depression. Total Federal receipts in the fiscal year 1930 aggregated $4,178,000,000. Treasury estimates indicate that receipts for the current fiscal year amount to only $2,240,000,000—a decline of nearly 50 per cent. Treasury estimates for the fiscal year 1933, the year for which we are budgeting, indicate total receipts of only $2,375,000,000.

Brief examination of the major items of revenue will indicate the character of the changes which have taken place. Customs receipts totaled $587,000,000 for the fiscal year 1930, and are estimated at $430,000,000 for the fiscal year 1933. Miscellaneous internal revenue collections aggregated $628,000,000 in 1930, and are estimated at $550,000,000 for 1933. The most drastic decline in receipts, however, is due to the reduction in the volume of income-tax payments. Current collections of individual income tax have dropped from $1,061,000,000 in 1930 to an estimated total of only $275,000,000 for 1933, while current corporation income-tax collections declined from $1,118,000,000 in 1930 to an estimated total of only $382,000,000. A tax upon incomes must be unproductive whenever incomes disappear.

It is inevitable that the Federal revenues should be seriously affected by the depression, accompanied as it has been by drastic reduction in incomes. The effect of the depression upon the revenues has, however, been accentuated by the fact that the individual income tax rests upon a relatively narrow base and is levied upon incomes which contain highly variable elements. As a result of the liberal exemptions allowed by the existing law the total individual income tax is paid by some 2,000,000 individuals. More than 94 per cent of these taxes are paid by about 260,000 individuals. Consequently the yield of the individual income tax is dependent to a very considerable degree upon the vacillating fortunes of a few individuals. By the proposed reduction in personal exemptions it is expected that some 1,700,000 individuals will be added to the taxpaying group.

SECURITY LOSSES

As to the large incomes particularly, both the number of returns reporting incomes in the upper brackets and the volume of income so reported are largely affected by the profits and losses resulting from dealings in securities. In fact, security gains and losses have been a major factor, accounting for unprecedented yields in the past as well as the recent decline in aggregate individual income-tax collections. The importance of this factor may be illustrated on the basis of the comparison between 1928 and 1930, the latest year for which data are available. The combined net income shown on returns reporting net income of $5,000 and over shows a decline of $6,180,000,000 from 1928 to 1930. Taking into account both profits and losses from security transactions shown on these returns, 1930 shows a decline as compared with 1928 of about $4,230,000,000 in income from dealings from securities. This decrease, therefore, accounted for approximately two-thirds of the change in reported net income. Reasonable restrictions are essential and are recommended in the bill now before you. As the result of provisions written into the bill by the House and amendments proposed by the Finance Committee affecting the treatment of profits and losses from dealings in securities, the extent to which ordinary income can in effect be wiped out for tax purposes by losses on securities is very materially reduced.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

With receipts cut practically in half by the depression, the Budget has been further burdened as a result of growing expenditures. Following the postwar deflation of Government outlays, greatly expanded by war activities, Federal expenditures reached a low point of about $3,494,000,000 in the fiscal year 1927. From this figure there has been a constant, unrelenting increase to an estimated total of more than $4,480,000,000 for the fiscal year 1932, exclusive of certain items of expenditure for the Government's reconstruction program, not now possible of accurate estimate. Expenditures for the fiscal year 1933 are estimated at about $4,113,000,000. At a time when corporations and individuals are struggling with the problems of depression, facing the necessity of adjusting expenditures to reduced incomes, and when the Government is calling upon the public to assume an additional tax burden of a billion dollars, the country has an absolute right to demand every practicable reduction in governmental expenditures—Federal, State, and local. I for one believe it our duty to proceed vigorously and promptly to meet this demand. In so far as the Federal Government is concerned, the situation calls for united action in the Congress and for every effort on the part of administrative officers of the Government to accomplish immediate reductions.

While earnestly supporting and urging the conduct of a prompt and effective program of economy as regards the Federal Government, I wish to point out that the problem of achieving real results is by no means as simple as some believe who merely point to the growth in expenditures and ask that balance be restored to the Budget by merely lopping off expenditures to the level of earlier years. The problem is far more intricate and difficult. Curtailment of governmental expenditures in a period of depression presents an entirely different problem from that confronting private enterprises. Even in times of depression essential governmental activities must be conducted on an effective and efficient basis. The need for government is a continuing one. If not most, certainly many of the Government's responsibilities and essential activities are not diminished in such times as these. In fact, in some instances quite the contrary is the case. Certainly in the present period of depression pressure for Governmental expenditures has been heavy, indeed. A very considerable part of the recent increase in Federal expenditures may be attributed to the cost of special activities undertaken as a result of emergency conditions. For example, the increase of nearly $620,000,000 in expenditures between 1927 and 1933 includes an increase of more than $270,000,000 in expenditures for public works, such as Federal-aid highways, public buildings, and river and harbor and flood-control activities. It includes also an increase of about $80,000,000 in outlays for such purposes as ship and aircraft construction and allied activities, $15,000,000 for the agricultural marketing fund, an increase of $128,000,000 for the postal deficiency, and an increase of more than $240,000,000 in expenditures for veterans.

GOVERNMENT ECONOMY ESSENTIAL

Immediate action must be taken. No one familiar with the Federal Budget can, however, take the position at this time that the indicated deficit for the fiscal year 1933 can be eliminated, or even largely eliminated, merely by reducing expenditures. The $4,113,000,000 of expenditures estimated for the fiscal year 1933 includes $1,137,000,000 for interest and statutory debt retirement, and another $980,000,000 for expenditures for veterans. Deducting these two items from the total, we have a balance of somewhat less than $2,000,000,000.

Clearly, then, we find economy opportunities rigidly restricted. Furthermore, most of the important economies require changes in basic legislation, limiting the scope of the activities imposed by existing law. Nevertheless, the same fundamental basic principles admittedly applicable to private enterprise are just as applicable to Federal, State, and local governments. Current expenditures must be kept within current income. Government extravagance must cease. Unnecessary spending must be eliminated. Retrenchment is essential. The prompt enactment of the revenue measure now before you will increase our revenues more than $1,000,000,000 for the fiscal year 1933. The balance of the $1,241,000,000 required to provide for the Budget, I am confident, can and should be covered by reducing expenditures.

SOURCES OF REVENUE

It is indeed a difficult and unpleasant task to select the sources from which additional revenue may be obtained, to recommend an increase in tax burdens by more than $1,000,000,000, and at the same time attempt to adhere to recognized fundamental principles. There are basic objections to every form of taxation. Every tax imposes a burden. We are confronted with the necessity of selecting measures which will raise the required revenues, distribute the burdens reasonably and equitably, prevent avoidable hardships, impose a minimum of impediment to economic recovery, and at the same time not do violence to the fundamental principles of sound taxation.

Ability to pay, a maxim of perhaps greater importance in periods of depression than in prosperous times, may be measured by income or by outgo. A reasonable tax, based upon either, is capable of yielding substantial revenues. At the same time there are very severe practical limitations inherent in each.

INCREASED INCOME TAXES

An income tax is based upon ability to pay. But the rates must not be so high as to prevent the carrying on of income-producing activities. Nor must the rewards of avoidance be too tempting. We are increasing our anticipated revenue from the tax upon individual incomes by approximately 133 per cent. We propose to collect during the fiscal year 1933 approximately $510,000,000 from less than 4,000,000 individuals, and approximately $434,000,000 from some 200,000 corporations. It is at once apparent that the necessary revenues can not be raised solely from a tax upon incomes. Furthermore, quite in accordance with my predictions, our past experience, particularly during the last few years, has proved that our income tax is not a dependable source from which reasonably constant revenues can be expected. During periods of depression, at a time when reliable revenues are most required, its yield is inadequate. We are forced to turn to other measures.

SALES TAXES

A sales tax—whether imposed upon a few selected commodities or upon commodities generally—is a tax based upon outgo, which is a fair measure of ability to pay. But here again we find inescapable limitations. We must select commodities the purchase of which indicates a true tax-paying ability on the part of the buyer. We must consider the effect on the industry, both from the point of view of a possible lessening of the industry's sales and of the resulting competitive disadvantages. We must consider the potential revenues involved; and we can not overlook administrative difficulties and costs.

Personally, under other circumstances, I would have preferred a general manufacturers' tax. Such a tax could be imposed at a relatively small rate. The burdens would be distributed evenly among all industries and all buyers. Discriminations would be avoided. Its yield would be reasonably constant, and could be accurately estimated. Certainty, both as to liability and amount, could be afforded. It could be administered efficiently and at a low relative cost. By reason of the action of the House of Representatives, however, it is my opinion, and the opinion of a substantial majority of the committee, that the enactment of a general manufacturers' tax at this session of Congress is highly improbable. Accordingly, we were forced to turn to taxes upon the sale of a relatively few selected commodities. In so doing we have attempted to adhere to the principles

I have above enumerated. We propose to raise approximately $560,000,000 of additional revenue through selected excise taxes and miscellaneous taxes.

I concede frankly that each proposed tax will be opposed vigorously by the groups directly affected. Each group admits the necessity of immediate increases in revenue. But we are constantly confronted with the cry, "Do not tax us." Just as, in curtailing appropriations, we hear the cry, "Reduce Government expenditures, but do not cut our appropriation."

THE ESTATE TAX

A Federal estate tax is capable of producing very substantial revenues. The so-called 80 per cent credit provision, under which a credit against the Federal estate tax is granted for estate and inheritance taxes paid to the various States—not exceeding, however, 80 per cent of the Federal tax—has very materially reduced its yield. At the same time the States have come to rely upon the additional revenue opportunities afforded them. In order not to affect State budgets and in order to increase very substantially the yield to the Federal Government of our estate tax, the bill as it passed the House proposes an additional estate tax, which will be independent of the 80 per cent credit provision, and under which the existing rates are more than doubled. However, inasmuch as the tax is not payable until at least a year after the death of the decedent, no additional revenues can be expected from this source during the fiscal year 1933, although it is estimated that we will receive an additional $134,000,000 during the first full year of its operation.

THE GIFT TAX

As a supplement to both the estate tax and income taxes, essential primarily by reason of the high rates, we propose a gift tax. Its greatest effect, however, will be in increased estate tax and surtax collections. Even if the gift tax produces no more than $10,000,000 directly in any one year, it will nevertheless be serving the full purpose of its enactment.

POSTAL RATES

Our Postal Service has for several years been operated with an unjustifiable deficit, amounting this year to $195,000,000. It is estimated that the deficit in 1933 will be approximately $155,000,000. I have always contended that the Postal Service should be made to pay for itself. This will be accomplished by the increased rates carried in the bill, together with other expected changes, under which $160,000,000 will be raised, covering the estimated deficit by a reasonable margin.

NEED FOR EXPEDITIOUS ACTION

I can not estimate the unfortunate effects upon the country resulting from the delays and uncertainties accompanying the enactment of the legislation now before us. Business activities have slackened; unemployment, with inescapable suffering of the innocent and helpless, is not improved; commodity prices have continued to fall; values have depreciated; liquidation has not stopped; credits remain frozen, and credit facilities refuse or fail to function; the recuperative powers of the many relief measures adopted have been diminished and in part nullified; fears at home and abroad have not been allayed. Without attempting to weigh its direct effect upon each of these, the postponed and uncertain enactment of an adequate revenue measure has been a depressing, discouraging, and influential factor.

Of lesser importance, perhaps, but as a fact which should not be overlooked, let me point out that each day's delay in final enactment is costing us directly, in loss of revenue, almost $2,000,000 a day. Prompt and adequate provision for the budgetary requirements of the Government and the strengthening and safeguarding of the public credit are indispensable conditions to the return of confidence and recovery in business, upon which the interests and welfare of all classes depend.

It is time, then, that we join in bringing about the immediate passage of the bill. We have worked in the committee upon a nonpartisan basis, except, perhaps, when the various tariff items were under consideration. Let us continue upon a nonpartisan basis. The bill is not a Republican measure nor a Democratic measure. It is a measure for the protection and preservation of your Government and my Government. It is above party lines and distinctions. I trust that it will be so received by the Senate. In such case, Mr. President, its immediate enactment will follow, and we will have taken the all-important step toward economic recovery.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator has made a very admirable speech, a very enlightening, very interesting, and clear address; but there is just one point I would like to inquire about. The Government issued bonds, and those bonds are payable at a certain time and bear a certain rate of interest. Congress provided for the payment of that interest and for a sinking fund to retire the bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Treasury anticipated payments and made payments on account of the principal of those bonds. I wanted to ascertain how much that amounted to.

Mr. SMOOT. Up to the end of last year it had amounted to $10,000,000,000. The original amount of the war debt was twenty-six billion and some odd million dollars, and the Treasury did reduce the debt down to sixteen billion and some odd millions. It is true that the deposit of the 2½ per cent in a sinking fund, as required by law, would not have furnished enough to redeem that much of our war debt; but I think it is most fortunate that the debt was reduced. If that had not happened we would now have been here, not struggling with $16,000,000,000 of those debts, but we would have had, more than likely, over $20,000,000,000 of debt.

Mr. FLETCHER. But we would not have had this deficit.

Mr. SMOOT. The deficit does not come about from the paying of those obligations.

Mr. FLETCHER. We would have had that money in the Treasury, would we not?

Mr. SMOOT. We never could have held in the Treasury of the United States for four or five years four or five billion dollars. If that money had been in the Treasury I am quite certain it would have been appropriated by Congress for some other purpose.

Mr. FLETCHER. I realize that; but we could have had in the Treasury some $2,000,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. It is possible, but it is not probable, that it would have been there. Every dollar paid by the Government upon those obligations, it seems to me, is like what happens when a man has a note in a bank. He pays it off just as quickly as he can, even though the note is not due, providing the bank will take the payments. That is what the Government of the United States did, and I thank the Lord for it.

Mr. President, there may be numerous questions propounded during the consideration of the bill. I have tried in the report to explain each one of the amendments proposed, and if Senators who are interested in the bill itself will examine the report, they will find an explanation of every amendment that has been made.

Therefore, Mr. President, I shall content myself at this time by stating that it is the first time since I have been a member of the Committee on Finance that there has been no partisanship shown in the drafting of such a measure as the one before us. The senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] was just as anxious as I was to get the bill out of the committee, and in the best form possible. I think if Senators will study the bill and the changes which have been made in the House provisions they will agree that the committee has done at least a fairly good job.

I shall conclude what I wanted to say at this time, and hope that the passage of the bill will be hastened in every way possible.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, following the remarks of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]

I ask to have the views of the minority, signed by several members of the Committee on Finance, printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, inasmuch as the views of the minority are to be printed in the RECORD, I think the majority report ought to go in at the same time, and I ask that it be printed also.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the report of the committee and the views of the minority were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 665, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

REVENUE BILL OF 1932

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Finance, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 10236):

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, having had the same under consideration, report favorably thereon, with certain amendments, and as amended recommend that the bill do pass.

FEDERAL BUDGET REQUIREMENTS

We are faced with a deficit for the fiscal year 1933 of $1,241,000,000, exclusive of statutory debt retirement. The deficit for the current fiscal year had reached a total of more than $2,300,000,000 by the end of April. We incurred a deficit in 1931 of $903,000,000. By the end of the current fiscal year our public debt will have been increased by more than $3,000,000,000, rising from $16,185,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year 1930 to more than $19,000,000,000 on June 30 of this year.

Although occasional moderate deficits in the operation of a government are to be expected, recurring large deficits must be avoided. Continued reliance upon borrowing, and failure to provide for a balance as between income and expenditures, and eventually for systematic debt reduction, would inevitably undermine the credit of governments as well as individuals. The maintenance of unimpaired credit is essential.

Your committee is unanimous in the conclusion that the indicated deficit for 1933 of $1,241,000,000 (exclusive of debt retirement) must be covered by reduction in expenditures and by the provision of additional revenue. The bill as reported by your committee should make this accomplishment possible. It should increase revenues by $1,010,000,000 during the fiscal year 1933, and it is expected that the Government economy program will reduce expenditures by at least $230,000,000.

It has been suggested that no effort should be made to balance the Budget in one year, that the process of balancing the Budget should be extended over a period of years, and that the intervening deficits should be met by borrowing. Although frequently misunderstood, this is substantially the policy adopted by the House of Representatives and approved by your committee. Last year's deficit was met by borrowing. This year's deficit has been, or will be, met by borrowing. With a deficit of $1,738,000,000 (including statutory debt retirements) in prospect for 1933 and a further large deficit for 1934, it is clear that immediate provision must be made for additional revenue. We would by this bill bring our Budget back into balance in the third year—that is, in 1933—and even then without covering requirements for statutory debt retirements in the amount of $497,000,000. Not until 1934 will our Government, notwithstanding the extraordinary revenue increases carried in the pending bill, obtain adequate revenues to meet current expenditures and also the requirements of the sinking fund.

Your committee has attempted to make its decisions accord with sound principles of taxation—ability to pay, tested either by income or outgo; maximum yields from rates not excessively high; avoidance of unnecessary hardship; prevention of undue disturbances to competitive situations; and a minimum of interference with economic recovery. It is believed that the bill as reported by your committee accords with these principles.

MAIN FEATURES OF BILL AS REPORTED

The more important features of the bill as reported by your committee may be summarized as follows:

(1) The bill will raise additional revenue, through changes in the income-tax rates and administrative provisions, in the amount of $287,000,000 for the fiscal year 1933.

(2) The normal tax rates applicable to individuals are increased to 3 per cent on the first $4,000, 6 per cent on the second $4,000, and 9 per cent on the balance of net income in excess of the exemptions. The exemptions have been reduced to $1,000 in the case of a single person and $2,500 in the case of a married person.

(3) Surtax rates begin at 1 per cent on net income in excess of $6,000 and increase to 45 per cent on net income in excess of $1,000,000.

(4) The corporate rate is increased from 12 to 14 per cent, and the existing exemption for small corporations is eliminated.

(5) The imposition of the normal tax upon corporate dividends, contained in the House bill, is eliminated.

(6) Adequate protection to the revenues against security losses is afforded, and the severity of the provisions of the House bill is mitigated.

(7) The increased estate-tax rates and the gift tax proposed by the House bill are retained.

(8) Duties are imposed upon the importation of oil, coal, lumber, copper, and rubber.

(9) The bill proposes to impose selective manufacturers' excise taxes which will raise during the fiscal year (inclusive of the above duties) $277,500,000.

(10) Many of the excise taxes contained in the House bill have been eliminated, such as the proposed tax on toilet preparations, furs, jewelry, yachts and motor boats, mechanical refrigerators, sporting goods and cameras, firearms and shells, matches, candy, and soft drinks.

(11) The bill will raise $280,000,000 through miscellaneous taxes upon telephone and telegraph messages, admissions, the issue or transfer of bonds or capital stock, conveyances, oil transported by pipe lines, and checks.

(12) Increases in first and second class postal rates and other pending postal legislation will raise $160,000,000, which should be sufficient to make the Postal Service self-supporting.

COMPARISON OF HOUSE BILL AND COMMITTEE BILL

The following table gives in detail a comparison of the provisions and estimated revenues of the bill after its passage in the House of Representatives and the bill as it is reported by your committee:

[3] Estimate not available.
[6] Estimate of Committee on Ways and Means, which includes estimated effect on Budget of H. R. 10236 and of other bills recently passed by House.

On the basis of the House estimates, the bill as passed by the House would raise $1,031,900,000. It will be noted, however, that these estimates include $20,000,000 for the increased estate tax, which, in view of the delayed enactment of the new legislation, does not now seem justified and has therefore been excluded from the summary of the bill as reported by your committee, although the estate tax rates are identical in both bills. Moreover, the prospective yield of pending postal legislation included in the summary of the House bill would be reduced by $10,500,000 by the latest estimates of the Post Office Department. These two changes would reduce the estimated yield of the House bill from $1,031,900,000 to $1,001,400,000, as compared with an estimated yield of $1,009,500,000 for the bill as reported by your committee.

INCREASE IN INDIVIDUAL RATES

The present law imposes normal tax rates upon net incomes of individuals, of 1½ per cent upon the first $4,000, 3 per cent upon the second $4,000, and 5 per cent upon the remainder. The House bill provided increases to 2, 4, and 7 per cent, respectively, and your committee recommends rates of 3, 6, and 9 per cent. Surtax rates under existing law begin at 1 per cent upon income of $10,000, and are graduated to 20 per cent upon income in excess of $100,000. The House bill imposes a rate of 1 per cent upon income in excess of $6,000, increasing the rate to 40 per cent upon income in excess of $100,000. The bill as reported by your committee adopts the rates of the House bill, but extends them up to 45 per cent upon income in excess of $1,000,000. The credit for earned income, for administrative simplicity, is changed from a tax credit to an exemption from normal tax. The maximum earned income under existing law is $30,000, and under the House bill and the bill as reported, is $12,000.

As a result of these provisions, a somewhat broader base is given to our income tax structure; somewhat larger taxes will be expected from those able to pay; and the Government revenues will be increased appreciably. At the same time, the proposed rates will not impose an undue burden upon any class of taxpayers. Persons with moderate means, notwithstanding the increases, will be called upon to pay only a relatively insignificant proportion of their income.

The tables following give a comparison of the tax liabilities of individuals under the existing law, the House bill, and the bill as reported by your committee.

INCREASE IN CORPORATION TAX

The existing law imposes a tax of 12 per cent upon the net income of corporations. The House bill increased this rate to 13½ per cent. The bill now reported proposes to increase the rate to 14 per cent. The committee appreciates the fact that even the existing corporate rate is somewhat out of line with our other income-tax rates. Furthermore, the corporate rate has been maintained at a relatively high level since the war. Nevertheless, your committee believes that additional revenue from corporations is necessary.

The existing law grants to corporations having a net income of $25,000 or less an exemption of $3,000. The House bill proposed to decrease this exemption to $1,000 and made it applicable to corporations having net income of $10,000 or less. Your committee recommends that the exemption be eliminated entirely. It is believed that every corporation having net income, irrespective of the size of that net income, is in a position to contribute to the revenue needs of the Government.

CONSOLIDATED RETURNS

The House bill proposed an additional tax of 1½ per cent upon the net income of an affiliated group of corporations which elected to file a consolidated return. Your committee recommends that this additional tax be eliminated. It sees no justification for it. The provisions for consolidated returns under the present law and regulations recognize sound accounting practices and require tax liabilities to be determined on the basis of the true net income of the enterprise as a whole. No improper benefits are obtained from the privilege. Your committee believes that it is highly desirable, both from the point of view of the administration of our tax laws and the convenience of the taxpayer, that the filing of consolidated returns by affiliated groups of corporations be continued, praticularly in view of the changes made in the revenue act of 1928 and in the regulations promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury thereunder. It is difficult to justify the exaction of a price for the use of this form of return.

Your committee made a very exhaustive study and analysis of the entire subject of tax liabilities of affiliated groups of corporations during its consideration of the revenue bill of 1928. Its conclusions are set forth in its report upon the revenue bill of 1928. It seems unnecessary to repeat them at the present time.

NORMAL TAX ON DIVIDENDS

Under all the revenue acts since 1913, dividends received by individuals have been exempt from normal tax. The purpose of the exemption is to prevent a second imposition of the basic normal tax upon the earnings and profits of corporations at the time of their distribution to stockholders. The House bill proposed to remove this exemption. Your committee believes that even the exigencies of the present situation do not justify double taxation of this nature and recommends that the exemption under the existing law be continued.

LIMITATION UPON SECURITY LOSSES

The House bill adopted very severe limitations upon the allowance of losses from the sale of securities, as a deduction in computing net income. The provision was based upon a twofold policy: (1) Protecting the revenues from the growing practice of reducing tax liabilities by the sale of securities on which losses had accrued, and (2) preventing speculative losses from wiping out ordinary income, which represents real tax-paying ability.

Your committee is of the opinion, however, that the House bill went much farther than the situation necessitated. Securities held for more than two years have been in the hands of investors. The losses they have suffered are decidedly real losses. Investments of this nature normally have been made from income upon which a tax was paid at the time it was earned. The shrinkage in the value of these investments is in every sense of the word a true loss actually sustained by the investor. The existing limitation, that capital losses can not reduce the tax by more than 12½ per cent, is adequate protection against excessive deductions. Accordingly, your committee is of the opinion that no change in this respect should be made in the existing law.

A somewhat different situation exists with respect to losses realized from the sale of securities held by the taxpayer for less than two years. These losses should properly be permitted only as an offset against gains from securities held for less than two years. But undue hardship under existing conditions should be avoided. Your committee believes that security gains and losses should be segregated, that security losses should be deducted solely from security gains; but that security gains should not be taxed until they actually exceed security losses. Accordingly, it is provided that any excess of the security losses in any year should be allowed, subject to certain necessary limitations, as a deduction against security gains in the subsequent year.

NET LOSSES

The net loss provision of the existing law is one of the essential protections against excessive hardships inherent in a tax based upon an arbitrary annual accounting. Tax-paying ability does not exist if a substantial part of a year's profits is required to cover a prior year's losses. The existing law is equitable and fair. The House bill proposed to eliminate it. Your committee recommends that the existing law be retained, but limited to a carry-over for but one year, rather than for two years.

ESTATE AND GIFT TAXES

The existing estate-tax rates are more than doubled. They are extended to 45 per cent, as compared with a maximum rate under the existing law of 20 per cent. The increase is not subject to the 80 per cent credit for State estate and inheritance taxes. As a protection to both estate and income taxes, a gift tax is imposed. The rates are approximately three-quarters of the estate-tax rates. The committee recommends no change.

MISCELLANEOUS EXCISE TAXES

The bill, as it passed the House, contains a large number of special excise taxes. Many of these taxes will produce very little revenue, involve difficulties of administration, and fall within the type frequently designated "nuisance taxes." Your committee is of the opinion that it would be much sounder to select a smaller group of commodities, impose rates which will raise the required revenues, and eliminate many of the minor taxes proposed by the House bill. In selecting the subjects of tax, your committee attempted, as far as possible, to prevent undue burdens upon any particular industry; to guard against disturbances to competitive situations; to select commodities the purchase of which would indicate taxpaying ability; to impose taxes capable of simple and inexpensive administration; and to select commodities which would yield fairly substantial revenues.

Your committee quite appreciates the fact that each particular industry selected feels very keenly that it should be exempt from tax and the necessary revenue collected elsewhere. However, your committee is confronted with the necessity of raising more than $700,000,000 through selective excise or miscellaneous taxes. The field of selection is necessarily limited. Important industries must be included. Your committee appreciates that the industries selected, in common with all other industries, have been and are seriously affected by the depression and consequent decreases in business activity and profits. It is realized that additional burdens at this time may seem unjustifiable and almost insurmountable. It is not believed, however, that taxes at the rates proposed by the bill as reported by your committee impose undue burdens upon industry and commerce or will seriously retard a return to normal business conditions. The required revenues must be raised. Benefits to be derived from the reestablishment of Federal finances upon an unquestionably sound basis far surpass any possible disadvantages from the burden of additional taxes.

MISCELLANEOUS TAXES

The bill as reported by your committee includes a number of miscellaneous taxes, among them the tax on admissions which is levied, with certain relatively minor exceptions, at a rate of 1 cent per 10 cents on each admission in excess of 10 cents. The rate of tax is the same as under existing law and as provided in the House bill. The present law, however, provides an exemption of $3 and the House bill exempts admissions of 45 cents or less.

Although realizing the importance of recreation afforded by theater entertainments, which constitute the principal subject of this tax, your committee believes that theater attendance even at low prices indicates definite tax-paying ability and considers that admissions provide a basis for tax, the incidence of which would be broadly distributed, and the burden of which would not be particularly heavy at the rates proposed. In the existing emergency a tax of 2 cents on a 20-cent admission or a tax of 3 cents on a 30-cent admission would not seem to constitute unduly burdensome contributions to the support of the Federal Government.

By reason of the fact that a great volume of theater charges fall below the exemption provided in the House bill, it is recommended that the tax be applied to all admissions in excess of 10 cents. The proposed tax is estimated to yield $110,000,000 for the fiscal year 1933, as compared with $40,000,000 estimated to be the tax obtained in the House bill. In view of the large amount of revenue to be obtained from the tax which your committee proposes, it is believed that the tax is definitely justified as a part of an emergency program.

The existing law provides for a tax of 2 cents per $100 of par value or per share of no par value on the transfer of stocks. The bill passed by the House raised this tax to 4 cents per $100 of par value or per share of no par value, the tax not to be less than one-fourth of 1 per cent of the sale price and to apply to loans of stock. Your committee concluded upon careful consideration that one-fourth of 1 per cent constituted an excessive tax and that the application of the tax to loans of securities, while increasing the tax in the case of short sales, would at the same time unduly interfere with other classes of operations requiring the loaning of securities—for example, in the case of sales of securities by persons living at a distance and, consequently, unable to make immediate delivery. It recommends, therefore, that the present tax be doubled and the rate increased to 4 cents per $100 of par value or per share of no par value.

The existing law contains no provision for tax on the transfer of bonds. The House bill provides for a tax of 2 cents per $100 or par value but not less than one-eighth of 1 per cent of the sale price on transfers of bonds. Since most bond transactions involve bearer securities, the administration of a tax based on a percentage of the sale price of such securities would be difficult. In addition, it is believed that the levy was excessive. Your committee, therefore, recommends a tax of 4 cents per $100 of par value.

TECHNICAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

TITLE I.—INCOME TAX

SECTION 1. APPLICATION OF TITLE

The proposed bill follows the general plan and arrangement of the revenue act of 1928. The proposed income-tax title is made applicable to 1932 and subsequent taxable years. The income-tax title of the 1928 act is not repealed by the bill and remains in force for the collection of taxes for the taxable years 1928 to 1931, inclusive.

The reference to section 811 (c) contained in the House bill is omitted by your committee, due to the fact that section 811 of the House bill has been stricken from the bill as reported.

SECTION 12 (C), CLERICAL

This change in a cross reference is made necessary by the change in income-tax rates applicable to individuals.

SECTION 12 (E). ADDITIONAL TAX ON EXCESSIVE COMPENSATION FOR PERSONAL SERVICES

Your committee believes that the large amounts of compensation, particularly in the form of bonuses, emoluments, and rewards frequently paid to the officials of corporations are greatly in excess of reasonable compensation for the services actually performed. Accordingly it recommends a higher tax upon the excess of such compensation over a reasonable amount. Your committee believes that under present circumstances compensation, to the extent that it exceeds compensation at the rate of $75,000 per year, should not be regarded as reasonable compensation for income-tax purposes, and that any bonus, emolument, or reward (whether taking the form of cash, stock, stock rights, securities, or any other property), exceeding compensation at that rate should be subject to a higher rate of tax, fixed by your committee at 80 per cent of such excess. The 80 per cent tax provided in this subsection is in lieu of all other taxes under the income-tax title in respect of the excess; that is, the excess should be excluded from the income subject to ordinary normal and surtax rates.

SECTION 22 (A). COMPENSATION OF PRESIDENTS AND JUDGES

This section has been amended to make it clear that compensation of the President of the United States and of judges of courts of the United States taking office after the date of the enactment of this bill is to be included in gross income. To effectuate that purpose, in cases in which the compensation for any such office has been provided in acts antedating the present bill, it is provided that all acts fixing the compensaton of such President and judges are by this provision amended so that in every case such compensation will be reduced by the amount of the Federal income tax resulting from the inclusion in gross incomes of the amount of such compensation.

SECTION 22 (B). DIVIDENDS OR INTEREST FROM DOMESTIC BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS

The present law exempts domestic building and loan associations from all taxation and, in addition, exempts from tax $300 in interest or dividends received by an individual from such associations. While your committee does not desire to disturb the exemption granted under the present law to domestic building and loan associations themselves, it sees no reason why interest and dividends received from such associations should not be taxable to the recipient like any other investment income, such as interest on bank deposits and dividends from ordinary corporations. Accordingly, the exemption allowed under section 22 (b) (7) of the present law is omitted from the proposed bill.

SECTION 22 (B). PENSIONS AND WORLD WAR COMPENSATION PAYMENTS

Your committee sees no valid reason for continuing the exemption in case of pensions and World War compensation payments granted by existing law, since it is believed that the credits for personal exemption and dependents provided in section 25 are adequate to take care of virtually all cases and that such amounts, if and to the extent they constitute income, should bear their portion of the tax.

SECTION 22 (B) (4). TAX-FREE INTEREST

The change in this section is made to bring the language of the section into accord with the clarifying change made in section 23 (b) pertaining to deductions of interest from gross income.

SECTION 22 (B) (7). CLERICAL

This is a clerical change occasioned by the repeal of section 16 (a) of the House bill relating to earned income from sources without the United States.

SECTION 23 (A). COMPENSATION FOR PERSONAL SERVICES

Your committee is of the opinion that the payment of any compensation to any person of an amount which exceeds compensation at the rate of $75,000 per year should be regarded, for income-tax purposes, as in excess of reasonable compensation for personal services actually rendered, and for that reason has amended this section by prohibiting a deduction of the amount by which any compensation of any person for personal services exceeds compensation at the rate of $75,000 per year.

SECTION 23 (B). INTEREST

Section 23 (b) has been clarified by a change in wording to indicate that no deduction may be taken for interest on indebtedness incurred or continued to carry obligations the interest on which is exempt from the taxes imposed by the income-tax title. This is simply a clarifying change and is not intended to alter the existing law. A corresponding change has been made in section 204 (c) (8).

SECTION 23 (C) (2). DEDUCTION FOR FOREIGN INCOME TAXES

The existing law allows a deduction in computing net income of so much of the income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes paid to a foreign country as is not allowed as a credit against the tax due the United States. In thus allowing both a credit and a deduction preferential treatment is frequently given to taxpayers receiving income from foreign sources. For example, a domestic corporation derives income of $100,000 from sources in the United States and $100,000 from sources in Great Britain. Such corporation pays to Great Britain a tax of $25,000 upon its British income. Under the present law this taxpayer is allowed a credit of $12,000 against its tax due this country and, in addition, a deduction of $13,000 (the balance of its British tax) from its United States income. Since the entire foreign income is, in effect, excluded from the taxpayer's gross income because of the allowance of the credit for foreign taxes, the result of the additional deduction is that the taxpayer fails to pay a full tax upon its income from domestic sources. As your committee believes that a full tax should be paid upon income from sources within the United States, the section has been amended to deny a deduction for foreign taxes in all cases where the taxpayer has indicated on the return an intention of claiming a credit for foreign taxes under section 131.

To make it clear that a taxpayer who in respect to any taxable year claims credit under section 131 for any foreign taxes is thereby precluded from obtaining a deduction under this section for any other foreign taxes, your committee has amended the House bill by the additions of the words "to any extent."

SECTION 23 (E), (F). CLERICAL

These amendments are made necessary by the insertion in the House bill of subsections 23 (r), (s), and (t) and by the elimination by your committee from the House bill of subsections (s) and (t) of that bill.

SECTION 23 (E) (3). CASUALTY LOSS CLAIMED AS DEDUCTION FOR ESTATE-TAX PURPOSES

Section 805 of the House bill provided that certain casualty losses incurred during the settlement of a decedent's estate should not be allowed as deductions for estate-tax purposes for the reason that they were allowable for income-tax purposes. Whether such losses should be allowed for purposes of the income or the estate tax depends largely upon the circumstances of the particular case, and your committee believes that an option should be given as to whether the deduction for losses of this character should be taken for one tax or for the other. To prevent any duplication of deductions it is provided that the deduction for income-tax purposes may be allowed only if at the time of the filing of the return no deduction has been claimed for such loss in a return of the estate tax. A corresponding limitation upon any deduction for estate-tax purposes has been inserted in the amendment to section 303 (a) (1) of the revenue act of 1926 made by section 805 of the bill. For example, a decedent dies leaving a will under which he devises an office building to X. The building, uninsured, burns down and X claims a deduction for the loss in his income-tax return. The executor of the estate will not be entitled to a deduction for the loss in determining the net estate reported in the estate-tax return thereafter filed. However, if the estate-tax return claiming the deduction is first filed, X will not be entitled to the loss deduction in his income-tax return.

SECTION 23 (G). CLERICAL

This is one of the series of amendments discussed in connection with section 111 (a) on a later page of this report.

SECTION 23 (I). CLERICAL

This is a change made necessary by the proposed amendment to section 117, relating to net losses.

SECTION 23 (L). DEPLETION

The House bill requires a change in the annual depletion allowance where a new estimate of the number of the recoverable units is made in the light of subsequent events. The effect of the amendment is shown by the following example:

A purchased for $1,000 an ore body with estimated recoverable units of 1,000. He removes 500 units and takes depletion deductions aggregating one-half of his cost, or $500. Subsequently it is ascertained that there remain in the mine 1,500 recoverable units and the original estimate of 1,000 recoverable units is revised. Under the amendment, his unrecovered cost ($1,000 less $500) would be spread over the revised estimate of the recoverable units (1,500) with the result that on each unit thereafter removed he would be allowed a depletion deduction of 33⅓ cents per unit instead of $1 per unit.

The provision in the House bill has been amended so as to make it clear that it is also to apply where the revision of the estimate of recoverable units results from day-to-day operations.

The cross reference contained in the House bill to section 114 (b) (3) relating to percentage depletion is changed in view of the fact that percentage depletion has been extended to metal mines as well as to sulphur and oil and gas wells.

SECTION 23 (N) (3). CLERICAL

This is a clerical amendment made necessary because section 7 of the vocational rehabilitation act has been superseded by section 12 of the World War veterans' act, 1924.

SECTION 23 (P) (1). DIVIDENDS RECEIVED BY A CORPORATION FROM AN EXEMPT CORPORATION

Dividends received by a corporation are allowed as a deduction in computing the net income of a corporation, upon the theory that a corporate tax has already been paid upon the earnings out of which the dividends are distributed. Where, however, the distributing corporation is exempt from tax, there is no reason why the dividends should be deducted from the gross income of the stockholder corporation. Accordingly the existing law has been changed to deny the deduction in such a case.

SECTION 23 (Q). CONTRIBUTIONS TO PENSION TRUSTS UNDER 1928 ACT

An amendment to the House bill has been inserted to make sure that any deduction allowable under the corresponding subsection of the 1928 act and apportioned under that act to any year or years subsequent to 1931 may be allowed for any taxable year covered by the bill.

SECTION 23 (R), (S), AND (T). LIMITATION ON STOCK LOSSES

There are no provisions in existing law corresponding to section 23 (r), (s), and (t). Many taxpayers have been completely or partially eliminating from tax their income from salaries, dividends, rents, etc., by deducting therefrom losses sustained in the stock and bond markets, with serious effect upon the revenue. It is apparent that a number of these losses are taken for the sole purpose of tax avoidance.

The House bill, in recognition of this situation, provided for the disallowance of all losses sustained on the sales of stocks and bonds to the extent that such losses exceeded the gains from similar transactions. Losses on stocks or bonds held over two years were offset against gains on such assets held over two years, and losses on the sales of stocks or bonds held two years or less were offset against gains on such assets held two years or less. Subject to certain limitations, an excess of losses over gains in one of the above-mentioned groups could be offset against the gains in the other group. The amount of the losses not allowed within the taxable year in no case could be carried forward to the succeeding year.

Your committee, while in general agreement with the purpose of the House bill, believes that the method adopted to carry out this purpose is somewhat too drastic in that it penalizes pure investment losses as well as mere speculative losses.

As now drafted the limitation that losses on stocks and bonds can only be taken to the extent of gains from similar transactions is confined to the sale of such securities which have been held for two years or less. Gains or losses arising from the sale for stocks and bonds held for over two years are in all cases treated precisely as under present law, whether such losses are incurred by a corporation or an individual. In this connection it should be stated that such losses are already subject to a very considerable limitation for tax purposes, inasmuch as, in the case of an individual, the reduction in tax can not exceed 12½ per cent of such losses.

Since the individual may pay a tax as high as 54 cents on the dollar under the rates proposed by your committee, the fact that the 12½ per cent limitation applies may reduce the advantage of a given loss for tax purposes by more than 75 per cent. Further limitation appears unnecessary in view of the above and because of the fact that these transactions are usually nonspeculative in character.

The method recommended by your committee in dealing with transactions in stocks and bonds held for two years or less, which obviously comprise the bulk of speculative transactions, may be stated as follows: The excess of losses over gains in these transactions is not allowed as a deduction against other income, but such excess may be carried forward and applied against gains from similar transactions in the subsequent year; provided, first, that there is deducted from said excess the amount of any losses brought forward from the preceding year; and, second, that the remainder may not be carried forward in an amount exceeding the net income of the taxpayer for the current taxable year. The reason for the first limitation is to restrict the carry-over to one year. The reason for the second limitation is to prevent the taxpayer from obtaining a deduction in the subsequent year for stock losses of the current year, which losses under existing law would have resulted in no tax benefit to the taxpayer in the current year because of the absence in such year of income against which to take the losses.

In this discussion of the limitation on stock losses, stocks and bonds held by a taxpayer primarily for sale in the course of his trade or business are treated as stocks and bonds held for two years or less, regardless of the time for which they may have been held.

The effect of these provisions may be illustrated by the following examples, wherein the terms 1-year losses and 1-year gains are used to denote losses or gains from the sale of stocks and bonds held for two years or less:

Case No. 1 (a).—Individual return 1932

Net income from salaries, dividends, rents	$50,000
Excess of 1-year losses over 1-year gains for 1932	100,000
1-year losses brought forward from prior year	(1)
Taxable income (present law)	-------
Taxable income (House bill)	50,000
Taxable income (Finance Committee bill)	50,000
Amount allowed as carry-over (Finance Committee bill)	50,000

In the above case it will be noted that the carry-over is limited to the net income; that is, to $50,000, although the 1-year losses not deducted in 1932 amount to $100,000. The taxable income is the same under the House bill and the Finance Committee bill.

Case No. 1 (b).—Individual return, 1933

Net income from salaries, dividends, rents	$100,000
Excess of 1-year losses over 1-year gains, computed without regard to the carry-over from 1932	75,000
1-year losses brought forward from 1932	50,000
Taxable income (present law)	25,000
Taxable income (House bill)	100,000
Taxable income (Finance Committee bill)	100,000
Amount allowed as carry-over (Finance Committee bill)	75,000

In the above case it will be noted that the net income limitation on the carry-over does not operate to cut down the amount of the carry-over, which is $75,000, i. e., the excess of 1-year losses over 1-year gains in 1933 computed without regard to the $50,000 carry-over from 1932.

Case No. 1 (c).—Individual return, 1934

Net income from salaries, dividends, rents	$150,000
Excess of 1-year gains over 1-year losses, computed without regard to the carry-over from 1933	65,000
1-year losses brought forward from 1933	75,000
Taxable income (present law)	215,000
Taxable income (House bill)	215,000
Taxable income (Finance Committee bill)	150,000
Amount allowed as carry-over (Finance Committee bill)	-------

In the above case it will be noted that the carry-over from 1933 is sufficient to eliminate from tax the 1-year gains of $65,000 in 1934, but that there will be no carry-over to 1935. The taxable income under the House bill is $215,000 and under the Finance Committee bill $150,000, showing some measure of relief to compensate for the denial of losses in the preceding year.

If cases 1 (a), 1 (b), and 1 (c) are surveyed as a whole, it will be found that over a 3-year period the individual under present law would pay taxes on $240,000, under the House bill on $365,000, and under the Finance Committee bill on $300,000.

Case No. 2.—Corporation, 1933

Operating net income	$200,000
Losses from sale of stocks and bonds held over 2 years	100,000
Excess of 1-year gains over 1-year losses, computed without regard to the carry-over from 1932	50,000
1-year losses brought forward from 1932	25,000
Taxable income (House bill)	200,000
Taxable income (Finance Committee bill)	125,000
Carry-over to 1934 (Finance Committee bill)	-------

It will be noted in the above case that the corporation under the Finance Committee bill secures substantial relief over the results obtained by the House bill.

[1] None allowable.

The exemption from the restrictions of these provisions provided for in the House bill is retained in the case of a dealer in securities (i. e., a merchant of securities whether an individual, partnership, or corporation, with an established place of business, regularly engaged in the purchase of securities at wholesale and their resale to customers); in the case of losses sustained in connection with transactions with customers in the regular course of business. Your committee recommends extending this exemption to banks and trust companies incorporated under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory, since it appears that such institutions should receive as favorable treatment as the dealers in securities. Traders or other taxpayers who buy and sell securities for investment or speculation, whether or not on their own account, and irrespective of whether such buying or selling constitutes the carrying on of a trade or business, are not regarded by your committee as dealers in securities within the meaning of this rule, and are not given exemption.

Subsection (s) requires that gains or losses from short sales of stocks and bonds, or from privileges or options to buy such securities, shall be treated as gains or losses from the sale or exchange of stocks and bonds held for less than two years. Your committee is of the opinion that there should be no distinction between such transactions and sales or exchanges of stocks and bonds. Accordingly, the limitation on stock losses is extended to this type of transactions.

Under subsection (t) the term "stocks and bonds" is defined. Federal, State, and municipal bonds are excluded from the definition so as not to hamper the sales of such securities. Bonds of foreign governments are also excluded.

SECTION 25 (A). CREDIT OF DIVIDENDS FOR NORMAL TAX PURPOSES

Your committee has restored to the bill the provisions of existing law permitting a credit for dividends for purposes of the normal tax. The provisions of the bill as reported by your committee represent a return to the rule established in prior revenue acts, which is designed to prevent a form of double taxation.

SECTION 25 (A) (1). DIVIDENDS RECEIVED BY INDIVIDUALS FROM EXEMPT CORPORATIONS

Dividends of a domestic corporation received by an individual are allowed as a credit against net income in computing the normal tax on the theory that the normal tax has already been paid by the corporation. Where, however, such corporation is one which is exempt from tax there is no reason why the dividends should not be subjected to normal tax when received by the stockholders. The law is changed to accomplish this purpose.

SECTION 25 (C). PERSONAL EXEMPTION

Under existing law, for the purposes of the normal tax only, a single person is entitled to a personal credit against income of $1,500 and a married person or head of a family is entitled to $3,500. On account of the urgent need for revenue, the personal exemption was by the House bill reduced to $1,000 in the case of a single person and to $2,500 in the case of a married person or head of a family.

SECTION 25 (E). CHANGE OF STATUS

Under existing law the credit for dependents is determined by the status of the taxpayer on the last day of the taxable year. A similar rule is applied with respect to the personal exemption in the case of a change of status on account of death. If the change in status is due to causes other than death a different rule applies in determining the amount of the personal exemption. These varying rules operate unjustly against both the Government and the taxpayer. For example, if a wife dies on December 30, her husband may be entitled only to the exemption allowed a single person. If the wife had income of her own, she would be entitled to the personal exemption allowed a married person; in addition, her husband would be entitled to the exemption allowed to a single person. Furthermore, if a child becomes 18 years of age on December 30, the parent loses the benefit of the $400 credit for dependents. The committee sees no reason for these varying rules. Accordingly, the proposed bill provides that if the status of the taxpayer, in so far as it affects the personal exemption or credit for dependents, changes during the taxable year, the exemption and credit shall be apportioned on a monthly basis under rules and regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

SECTIONS 25 (F) AND 25 (G). EARNED INCOME CREDIT

The proposed amendments add subsections (f) and (g) to section 25 and are in lieu of section 31 of the existing law. Subsection (f) changes the form of the credit from a credit against the tax equal to 25 per cent of the tax on the earned net income to a credit against net income (but only for normal tax purposes) equal to 12½ per cent of the amount of the earned net income. While this change produces approximately the same result as the old system at the new rates it greatly simplifies the computation of the tax, eliminating 14 items from the return form. To prevent the credit from absorbing unduly the tax on other income it is provided that the amount of the credit shall in no case exceed 12½ per cent of the actual net income as distinguished from the earned net income.

Subsection (g) is the same as section 31 (a) of the existing law except that the $30,000 limitation on earned net income is reduced to $12,000.

SECTION 26. CREDITS OF CORPORATIONS AGAINST NET INCOME

The present law allows a credit against net income of $3,000 in the case of corporations having a net income of $25,000 or less.

Under the House bill the credit is reduced to $1,000 and granted only to corporations having a net income of $10,000 or less. Your committee has eliminated this credit entirely in view of the urgent need for revenue.

SECTION 44 (D). TRANSMISSION AT DEATH OF INSTALLMENT OBLIGATIONS

Your committee has added to section 44 (d) a provision that the subsection shall not apply to the transmission at death of installment obligations if a bond is filed in the proper amount conditioned upon the return as income by any person receiving any payment on account of such obligations of the same proportion of such payment as would have been returnable by the decedent had he lived and received the same. It has come to the attention of your committee that considerable hardship sometimes occurs in the application of existing law to cases of decedents who die possessed of substantial amounts of installment obligations. In such cases the entire amount of the profit represented by the obligations must be reported as income in the return of the decedent for the year of his death. Your committee believes that if, for example, the estate of the decedent or his next of kin or legatees file a bond to return as income the proper proportion of the payments received by them on account of the installment obligations received from the decedent, the revenue will be properly protected. This section is accordingly amended to provide for such procedure.

SECTION 47 (E). CLERICAL

This is a clerical change made necessary by the elimination from section 26 of the specific credit of corporations against income.

SECTION 51 (A) AND (B). CLERICAL

These are amendments made necessary as the result of the amendments made to section 25 (c), reducing the personal exemption to $1,000 for a single person and $2,500 for a married person.

SECTION 101 (C) (8) (C). CLERICAL

This amendment makes a clerical change in this subsection by inserting a reference to the revenue act of 1928 in lieu of a reference to the revenue acts of 1924 and 1926. The revenue acts of 1924 and 1926 are omitted for the reason that if any taxpayer received stock or securities in a distribution wherein no gain or loss was recognized under such acts, such stock or securities have necessarily been held for more than two years prior to January 1, 1932, the effective date of this title.

SECTIONS 101 (C) (8) (D); 113 (A) (11), AND 118. WASH SALES

Section 101 (c) (8) of the existing law recognizes that in certain cases where the gain or loss basis of old property carries over, in whole or in part, to newly acquired property, the newly acquired property is regarded as taking the place of the old property and the two are regarded as the same property for the purpose of determining the period the property was held. The existing law does not specifically cover the cases of property acquired in connection with a wash sale, although no loss from such sale was recognized under section 118 and the basis of the old property is carried over in whole or in part under section 113 (a) (11) to the new property. Your committee sees no reason why property acquired under these circumstances should not be accorded the same treatment as is accorded in other similar cases. Accordingly a new subparagraph (D), added to section 101 (c) (8) by the House bill, is concurred in by your committee.

In many cases of "wash" sales the shares disposed of in the "wash" sale have been purchased at different times and at different prices, or the shares repurchased in connection with the sale are subsequently sold at different times and at different prices, or the number of shares repurchased are greater or less than the number of shares sold. In all such cases some allocation as between the shares sold and the shares repurchased is absolutely essential in order to apply the new "tacking" provision included in section 101 (c) (8); and such allocation is, in fact, equally desirable in determining the amount of the loss to be disallowed on the "wash" sale and the basis for computing future gain or loss on the shares repurchased in connection with the "wash" sale. In the prior act it was assumed that such identification or allocation was unnecessary or, if necessary, could readily be made. In the types of cases mentioned above an accurate allocation is often impossible, and resort must be had to some rule of thumb. As it would be impracticable to state in the act a rule of uniform application to all the possible types of cases, it is provided in subsections (b) and (c) of section 118 that such allocation shall be made under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner. The allocation so made will, of course, be applicable not only for the purpose of section 118 but also for the purposes of sections 101 (c) (8) and 113 (a) (11). In view of this new provision the last sentence of section 118 of the 1928 act has been eliminated.

Section 118 has been amended to show clearly that the wash-sale provisions apply to sales and repurchases occurring on the same day; this change is regarded as declaratory of the existing law and is made in the interest of clarity only. The section has also been amended to make it clear that it applies only to cases of the acquisition of substantially identical stock or securities by purchase or through a taxable exchange on which the gain or loss was fully recognized; the result of the amendment is to eliminate any possibility of a conflict between section 113 (a) (11) and other basic provisions of the law. Other changes in the language of sections 113 (a) (11) and 118 are for clarification only.

SECTION 103 (11). EXEMPTION OF MUTUAL HAIL, CYCLONE, CASUALTY, OR FIRE INSURANCE COMPANIES

The provisions of the existing law if subject to the interpretation sometimes contended for would result in the exemption of virtually all mutual property insurance companies without regard to their character or manner of organization and operation. Thus it is contended that the phrase "or other" following "farmers," does not restrict the exemption to those companies which are similar to the type commonly known as "farmers'" and that this phrase in fact embraces practically all mutual property insurance companies which are not "farmers'" companies. It is also contended that the clause in the existing law requiring the income to be "used or held for the purpose of paying losses or expenses" is complied with by all mutual companies, since all such companies are at least in principle required to hold all of their income for the payment of losses (present or prospective) and of expenses. In order to state more clearly what your committee believes to be the true policy underlying the exemption of mutual insurance companies of this general class the bill confines the exemption to companies of the type commonly known as "farmers'," "county," "town," or "local" mutuals, with the same limitation as in the existing law that the income must be used or held for paying losses or expenses. The use of the words "farmers'," "county," etc., as modifying the word "mutuals" is not intended to describe or denote different types of mutual insurance companies but rather to indicate some, if not all, of the designations employed in the several State statutes to denote the same general type of mutual insurance companies. Companies of this type are almost without exception organized under statutes which restrict the territorial scope of their operations and also their manner of organization and operation so as to preserve their truly mutual character.

SECTIONS 111 (A), 113 (A), 113 (B) (2), 114 (A), 114 (B) (1), AND 23 (G). ADJUSTED BASIS FOR DETERMINING GAIN, LOSS, DEPRECIATION, AND DEPLETION Sections 111 (a), 114 (a), 114 (b) (1), and 23 (g) of the 1928 act provide in substance that gain, loss, depreciation, and depletion shall be determined upon the "basis provided in section 113." Subsection (a) of the latter section provides, in the case of certain gifts or exchanges of property, where no gain or loss results or where any gain or loss which might result is not recognized, in whole or in part, that the basis of the property shall be continued or carried over beyond the time of the gift or exchange substantially as if the gift or exchange had not occurred. The cases covered by these provisions fall roughly into two general classes: (1) Where the basis of the property in the hands of the taxpayer is the same as it was in the hands of the transferor, and (2) where the basis of the property in the hands of the taxpayer is the same as the basis of property previously held by the taxpayer.

These provisions, however, do not in terms state whether "basis" means (1) the original capital investment in the property, or (2) the net capital investment in the property at any given point of time after adjustment for such items as have had the substantial effect of increasing or diminishing the original investment. Subsection (b) of section 111 requires the making of such adjustments to the basis, but it is argued that this subsection is limited to the computation of gain or loss under subsection (a) of the same section, after the basis has been determined under section 113. Hence, it has been contended that the adjustments provided for in section 111 (b) have no place and are to be disregarded in the determination of the basis under section 113. Some support for this contention is found in the decision of the Board of Tax Appeals in the case of Burlington Gazette Co. (21 B. T. A. 156), construing the corresponding provisions of the 1924 and 1926 acts.

In some simple cases the principle contended for creates no great practical difficulties. But in the great number of cases which are covered by the provisions of section 113 requiring a continuation or carry-over of basis, this principle would produce results palpably contrary to the whole spirit and purpose of the law.

Suppose that Corporation A buys machinery for $10,000, holds it for a period of years during which $2,500 of depreciation is written off and allowed as deductions, and then transfers the machinery to Corporation B in a tax-free reorganization. Under section 113 (a) the basis of the property in the hands of Corporation B is the same as it would be in the hands of Corporation A. Under the principle contended for, B, if it sold the property the day after the transfer from A, could compute gain or loss on the $10,000 cost of the property to A undiminished by the depreciation which had been allowed to A; or, if B continued to hold the property, it could recover through depreciation deductions the full $10,000 cost of the property to A, notwithstanding the fact that $2,500 of this cost had already been returned to A through depreciation deductions. Certainly no such result was ever intended. Since A was permitted to transfer the property to B free of tax, B should merely take A's position in respect to the property and should recover the same capital investment that A would have recovered had it continued to own the property.

Or, suppose that M buys stock of the X Corporation for $10,000, holds it for a period of years, during which he receives distributions of $2,500 which are properly applicable against basis, and then exchanges the stock for stock of the Y corporation in a tax-free reorganization. Under section 113 (a) the basis of the Y stock, in the hands of M, is the same as the basis of the X stock. Under the principle contended for, if M should sell the Y stock, he could compute gain or loss on the full $10,000 cost of the X stock, notwithstanding the fact that he had received distributions on the X stock which should have reduced the basis. If M had continued to hold the X stock and then sold it, he would, admittedly, be required to reduce the $10,000 cost by the $2,500 of distributions applicable against basis. Since M was permitted to make the exchange of stocks free of tax, the law clearly intends that the Y stock should simply take the same position as the X stock, and that M should recover the same capital investment from the Y stock which he would have recovered from the X stock had he continued to own it.

The committee does not believe that the existing law will be interpreted in the manner claimed and the whole purpose of the law defeated by so obviously a narrow construction. The provisions of the new bill, however, are designed to remove any possibility of controversy over the matter.

In providing more clearly for this type of cases, the committee has found it advisable to make a number of changes in the arrangement and phraseology of the provisions of the 1928 act relating to gain, loss, depreciation, and depletion.

Instead of using the term "basis" interchangeably to denote two difference concepts, the new bill employs the terms "unadjusted basis" (or, for brevity, "basis") and "adjusted basis." "Basis" means the original capital investment in the property and is provided for in subsection (a) of section 112. "Adjusted basis" means, in substance, the net capital investment in the property at any point of time when it becomes material to determine gain or loss, depreciation, etc. It is the "basis" determined by reference to subsection (a), adjusted in the manner provided in subsection (b).

Whereas sections 23 (g), 111 (a), 114 (a), and 114 (b) (1) of the 1928 act referred to the "basis provided in section 113," the corresponding sections of the new bill make reference to the "adjusted basis provided in section 113 (b)."

The adjustment provisions which in the 1928 act were included in section 111 have been taken out of that section and, with certain changes to be mentioned separately (see discussion under sec. 113 (b)), included in section 113 as subsection (b). Paragraph (2) of this subsection contains the specific provisions governing the case of a "substituted basis"; that is, where the "basis" is continued or carried over from one person to another or from one piece of property to another. It is provided, in substance, that where there is a substituted basis or a series of substituted bases, not only the "basis" itself, but also the adjustments pertaining thereto must be continued or carried over. For example, A purchases the X building and subsequently gives it to his son, B. B exchanges the X building for the Y building in a tax-free transaction, and then gives the Y building to his wife, C. C, in determining gain or loss or depreciation upon the Y building, is required to take account of the depreciation which was successively allowable to A and B upon the X building and to B upon the Y building, in addition to the depreciation allowable to herself during her ownership of the Y building.

SECTION 112 (C) (2). CLERICAL

This amendment of the House bill is made necessary to carry out the policy of your committee in restoring the provision of section 115 (b) of existing law exempting from tax earnings or profits accumulated or increase in value of property accrued before March 1, 1913.

SECTION 112 (H). CLERICAL

The present law in section 112 (h) provides that the distribution in pursuance of a plan of reorganization by a corporation a party to the reorganization of its stocks or securities or stocks or securities in another corporation a party to the reorganization shall not be considered a distribution of earnings or profits for certain purposes of the tax law. Obviously, this rule should be applied only if no gain to the distributee was recognized by law, and the House bill inserted a provision to this effect.

SECTION 112 (K). TRANSFERS TO FOREIGN CORPORATIONS

Property may be transferred to foreign corporations without recognition of gain under the exchange and reorganization sections of the existing law. This constitutes a serious loophole for avoidance of taxes. Taxpayers having large unrealized profits in securities may transfer such securities to corporations organized in countries imposing no tax upon the sale of capital assets. Then by subsequent sale of these assets in the foreign country the entire tax upon the capital gain is avoided. For example, A, an American citizen, owns 100,000 shares of stock in corporation X, which originally cost him $1,000,000 but now has a market value of $10,000,000. Instead of selling the stock outright A organizes a corporation under the laws of Canada, to which he transfers the 100,000 shares of stock in exchange for the entire capital stock of the Canadian company. This transaction is a nontaxable exchange. The Canadian corporation sells the stock of corporation X for $10,000,000 in cash. The latter transaction is exempt from tax under the Canadian law and is not taxable as United States income under the present law. The Canadian corporation organizes corporation Y under the laws of the United States and transfers the $10,000,000 cash received upon the sale of corporation X's stock in exchange for the entire capital stock of Y. The Canadian corporation then distributes the stock of Y to A in connection with a reorganization. By this series of transactions A has had the stock of X converted into cash and now has it in complete control.

While it is probable that the courts will not hold all transactions of this nature to be tax-free exchanges, the committee is convinced that the existing law may afford opportunity for substantial tax avoidance. To prevent this avoidance the bill withdraws the transaction from the operation of the nonrecognition sections where a foreign corporation is a party to the transaction unless prior to the exchange the commissioner is satisfied that the transaction is not in pursuance of a plan having as one of its principal purposes the avoidance of taxes. It will be noted that under this provision a taxpayer acting in good faith can ascertain prior to the transaction by submitting his plan to the commissioner that it will not be taxable if carried out in accordance with the plan. Of course, if the reorganization or the transfer is not carried out in accordance with the plan submitted the commissioner's approval will not render the transaction tax free.

This subsection provides for the full recognition of gain from any transaction described in any of the designated subsections (b) (3), (4), and (5), (d), (g), and so much of (c) as refers to (b) (3) and (5), involving a foreign corporation or the stock or securities thereof. That is, the entire amount of gain will be recognized upon any transfer of property to or by a foreign corporation, any exchange of stock or securities for stock or securities of a foreign corporation or vice versa, or any distribution by or to, or of the stock or securities of, a foreign corporation, unless prior to the transaction the commissioner is satisfied that it is not in pursuance of a plan having as one of its principal purposes the avoidance of taxes. For all other purposes, including the nonrecognition of loss in any transaction described in the foregoing subsections, the tax status of a foreign corporation is not affected by the new subsection.

Another aspect of this same problem is discussed later in this report in connection with Title VII.

SECTION 113 (A) (7). BASIS OF PROPERTY TRANSFERRED TO A CORPORATION WHERE CONTROL REMAINS IN THE SAME PERSONS

Section 113 (a) (7) of the existing law provides that where in connection with a reorganization assets are transferred from one corporation to another, the assets so transferred shall retain the same basis in the hands of the new corporation as they had in the hands of the old corporation; but the application of this section is limited to cases in which an interest or control of 80 per cent or more in the assets so transferred remains in the same persons. This 80 per cent limitation has been reduced to 50 per cent to check tax avoidance, for the reason that experience indicates it is easy to secure a temporary investment of 21 per cent of friendly capital in the new corporation and thereby secure a stepped-up basis for the property transferred.

SECTION 113 (A) (8). PROPERTY ACQUIRED BY ISSUANCE OF STOCK OR AS PAID-IN SURPLUS

This subsection was changed in the House bill in order to reflect the long-established position of the Treasury Department relative to the basis of property transferred to a corporation as paid-in surplus. The Treasury has consistently regarded the basis of such property to the corporation as being the same as the basis of the property to the transferor. However, the recent decision of the Board of Tax Appeals in Rosenbloom Finance Corporation v. Commissioner (24 B. T. A. 763), has opened an unexpected avenue of avoidance which, if ultimately sustained, might result in considerable loss of revenue. This decision holds that the basis of property transferred to a corporation as paid-in surplus is the fair market value of such property at the date of transfer. Regardless of the ultimate outcome of the Rosenbloom case, it appears advisable to amend subsection 1113 (a) (8) by the addition of a paragraph providing for carrying over the transferor's basis in such a case, in order to insure the continuation of this long-established rule.

Your committee has added to section 113 (a) (8) (B) a provision that the basis of property transferred to a corporation as a contribution to capital shall be the same as the basis in the hands of the transferor.

SECTION 113 (A) (12). DETERMINATION AND ADJUSTMENT OF THE BASIS OF PROPERTY ACQUIRED DURING AFFILIATION

The Treasury regulations prescribed under section 141 (b) of the revenue act of 1928 require the members of an affiliated group to reduce the basis of the stock of another member of the affiliated group which they hold by the losses of such member which were included in the consolidated return to offset the income of the other members and which could not have been availed of by such member as a net loss if it had made separate returns. It is contended that, unless the statute requires such prior reduction of basis to be recognized for 1932 and subsequent years, the effect of the reduction under the regulations will be lost. Accordingly, your committee has amended this section so as to require that the basis of property acquired during any period in 1929 or any subsequent taxable year in respect of which a consolidated return is filed shall not only be determined under the regulations prescribed under section 141 (b) of this bill and the revenue act of 1928 but also that such basis shall be adjusted in accordance with such regulations. Under this amendment, corporations which were affiliated and filed consolidated returns for any one or more of the years 1929, 1930, or 1931 can not, by filing separate returns in 1932, avoid the adjustments required by the regulations in force at the time the consolidated returns were filed.

SECTION 113 (A) (13). PROPERTY ACQUIRED BEFORE MARCH 1, 1913

The rule as to property acquired before March 1, 1913, which was stated as subsection (b) of section 113 in the 1928 act, is now stated as paragraph (13) of subsection (a). The language of the former provision has been changed largely for the purpose of giving clearer recognition to the fact that the adjustments to cost in respect to the period prior to March 1, 1913, must be made before the comparison between cost and March 1, 1913, value is made.

For example, the cost of property acquired in 1905 was $100,000, and the depreciation sustained up to March 1, 1913, $25,000, so that the adjusted cost on March 1, 1913, was $75,000. At that date the fair market value of the property was $65,000. Since this is less than the adjusted cost at March 1, 1913, it is disregarded. The "basis" is, therefore, cost, or $100,000, and this amount, adjusted for depreciation both prior and subsequent to March 1, 1913, becomes the "adjusted basis."

Suppose, however, that the fair market value at March 1, 1913, was $85,000. Since this is greater than the adjusted cost at that date, it is taken as the "basis," and this amount, adjusted for depreciation subsequent to March 1, 1913, becomes the "adjusted basis."

SECTION 113 (B) (1). ADJUSTED BASIS

Paragraph (1) of section 113 (b) of the bill corresponds substantially to section 111 (b) of the 1928 act.

The subparagraph lettered (B) in the prior act has been separated into two subparagraphs lettered (B) and (C), to indicate more clearly the different rules applicable to the period since February 28, 1913, and the period prior thereto.

In subparagraph (B), relating to depreciation, etc., for the period since February 28, 1913, the bill requires that adjustment be made "to the extent allowed (but not less than the amount allowable)" instead of "by the amount * * * allowable" as in the prior act. The Treasury has frequently encountered cases where a taxpayer, who has taken and been allowed depreciation deductions at a certain rate consistently over a period of years, later finds it to his advantage to claim that the allowances so made to him were excessive and that the amounts which were in fact "allowable" were much less. By this time the Government may be barred from collecting the additional taxes which would be due for the prior years upon the strength of the taxpayer's present contentions. The Treasury is obliged to rely very largely upon the good faith and judgment of the taxpayer in the determination of the allowances for depreciation, since these are primarily matters of judgment and are governed by facts particularly within the knowledge of the taxpayer, and the Treasury should not be penalized for having approved the taxpayer's deductions. While the committee does not regard the existing law as countenancing any such inequitable results, it believes the new bill should specifically preclude any such possibility. Your committee has not thought it necessary to include any express provision against retroactive adjustments of depreciation on the part of the Treasury as the regulations of the Treasury seem adequate to protect the interests of taxpayers in such cases. These regulations require the depreciation allowances to be made from year to year in accordance with the then known facts and do not permit a retroactive change in these allowances by reason of the facts developed or ascertained after the years for which such allowances are made.

The requirement in subparagraph (B) of the House bill that the adjustment for depletion should be computed without regard to discovery value or percentage depletion is eliminated in the bill as to all adjustments in respect of the taxable year 1932 and subsequent years. Your committee believes it only fair that the basis of the property should be adjusted to the full extent of the depletion allowances, without regard to the method by which these allowances are determined. In view of the substantial change from the existing law in this respect, your committee is of the opinion that it should not disturb the depletion adjustments in respect of years prior to 1932.

The existing law requires the basis of stock to be reduced by distributions which, under the law when made, were applicable against basis. The bill, in subparagraph (D), requires, in addition, that basis be reduced by distributions which were free of tax when made. The Board of Tax Appeals has held that distributions out of profits accumulated before March 1, 1913, were not technically a return of capital, because made out of profits rather than capital, and could not be applied against basis in the absence of a specific statutory requirement. Some of the earlier revenue acts, while exempting such distributions from tax, did not in terms require them to be applied against basis, and distributions made during the effective periods of these acts would not, under the language of the existing law, be applicable against basis. The reason for exempting distributions of this character was that they were regarded as closely akin to a return of capital, whether or not technically such, and the same reasoning requires that they be applied in reduction of basis.

SECTION 114. BASIS FOR DEPLETION

The amendment to paragraph (b) (2) as contained in the House bill makes it clear that in the case of metal and sulphur mines the depletion allowances may not longer be computed upon the basis of discovery value.

Paragraph (b) (3) of the House bill has been amended by the elimination of the word "sulphur" to restrict the application of the paragraph to oil and gas wells.

SECTION 114 (B) (4). PERCENTAGE DEPLETION FOR METAL MINES AND SULPHUR

Under paragraph (b) (4) metal mines are granted a percentage depletion allowance of 15 per cent, and sulphur mines or deposits of 23 per cent of the gross income from the property during the taxable year. As in the case of oil and gas wells this allowance can not exceed 50 per cent of the net income of the taxpayer from the property. In respect to the taxable years 1932 and 1933 the taxpayer is privileged to have the greater of either (1) the percentage depletion allowance or (2) an allowance computed on the adjusted basis provided in section 113 (b) (usually cost or March 1, 1913, value, with adjustments). This privilege is the same for those two years as that accorded both under the existing law and the bill in the case of oil and gas wells for all years.

In the return for the taxable year 1933, however, the taxpayer is required to state as to each property whether he elects to have the depletion allowance for such property for succeeding taxable years computed with or without reference to percentage depletion; this election must be as between either percentage depletion or depletion computed upon the adjusted basis. In the case of any property in respect of which a return is first made in a year subsequent to the taxable year 1933, the election indicated in the return for such year shall be binding as to all future years. If the taxpayer fails to make such election in the return in which it should be indicated, the depletion allowance for that and succeeding taxable years will be computed on the adjusted basis.

SECTION 115. SURPLUS ACCUMULATED PRIOR TO MARCH 1, 1913

Under the present law if a corporation pays a dividend out of earnings or profits accumulated before March 1, 1913, or out of increase in value of property accrued before March 1, 1913, the dividend in either case is not taxable to the shareholder, but the amount of the dividend reduces the basis of the stock in his hands. Under the House bill the dividend would be subject to tax as in the case of any other dividend, and the basis of the stock would not be reduced. The provisions of the present law have been in force, except for certain amendments, since the 1916 act, and your committee believes that they should continue in force. Consequently, they have been restored without change.

Under existing law a distribution made from a depletion reserve based upon discovery value of a mine is not taxable as a distribution of earnings or profits but is applied in reduction of the basis of the stock. There is no reason for exempting these distributions from taxation, as they represent neither the return of capital nor earnings accumulated prior to March 1, 1913. Accordingly, the last sentence of section 115 (d) of existing law was eliminated by the House bill.

Under existing law the provisions of section 115 (g) were made applicable in the case of the cancellation or redemption of stock not issued as a stock dividend only if the cancellation or redemption was made after January 1, 1926. This provision was inserted to prevent section 115 (g) being retroactive. It is, however, no longer necessary because the proposed income-tax title applies only to 1932 and subsequent years.

SECTION 116. EXEMPTION OF EARNED INCOME FROM SOURCES WITHOUT THE UNITED STATES

This section has been amended by the elimination of the subsection excluding from gross income amounts received by bona fide nonresidents of the United States from sources without the United States. Your committee believes there is no reason for the continuance of this exemption in the case of citizens of the United States residing abroad, for the reason that under other sections of the act such citizens are granted a credit for income taxes paid foreign countries and should not be further relieved from Federal income taxes. Furthermore, a considerable proportion of the individuals previously benefited by this subsection have been employees of the United States who, because of their status as such, were usually exempt from any foreign tax upon their compensation received from the United States; these citizens are not believed by your committee to be entitled to a complete exemption from the Federal income tax upon such compensation.

SECTION 116 (B). EMPLOYEES OF ALASKAN AND HAWAIIAN GOVERNMENTS

Under the revenue act of 1928 the compensation of teachers in Hawaii and Alaska is exempt from tax, but this exemption did not extend to other Territorial employees. In the amendment of April 12, 1930 (ch. 136, 46 Stat. 161), to the Territorial act of April 30, 1900, salaries or wages paid by the Territory of Hawaii or any of its political subdivisions for services rendered in connection with a governmental function are made exempt from the Federal income tax. No such exemption is granted to employees of Alaska or the District of Columbia. Accordingly, the House bill repeals such amendment.

SECTION 117 (A) (3). CLERICAL

This amendment is necessitated by the additional paragraph relating to percentage depletion, included in section 114 (b).

SECTION 117 (B). NET LOSSES

The existing law permits the taxpayer to apply a net loss sustained in one taxable year against his net income for the succeeding taxable year; and if such net loss is in excess of his taxable income for such succeeding year, he may deduct such excess loss from his net income for the next taxable year. Under the bill as passed by the House the taxpayer was not entitled, in computing his net income for the taxable years 1932, 1933, and 1934, to use any net loss sustained for the years 1930, 1931, 1932, or 1933. For the taxable year 1934 and subsequent taxable years the taxpayer was entitled under the House bill to carry losses sustained during such years forward one year instead of two years.

The amendment made by your committee to the House bill allows for the taxable years 1932, 1933, and 1934 a similar deduction as in the House bill was allowed for the year 1935 and subsequent years.

SECTION 131. CREDIT FOR FOREIGN INCOME TAXES

In addition to the limitation contained in the existing law, by reason of which the credit for foreign taxes may not exceed the same proportion of the tax against which the credit is taken which the amount of net income from foreign sources bears to the total net income, the House bill added the limitation that the credit for taxes paid to any country should not exceed the same proportion of the tax as the income from that country bears to the total income. In the judgment of your committee, this additional limitation imposes undue restrictions upon our citizens doing business in foreign countries, and it has therefore been eliminated.

Since a taxpayer may not have in the same taxable year both the credit under this section and the deduction under section 23 (c) (2), it is no longer necessary to provide, in connection with the computation of the credit under subsection (b) of section 131, that the net income shall be computed without deduction of foreign taxes.

The new provision in subsection (d), that taxes taken as a credit upon the accrual basis may not also be taken as a deduction, constitutes simply a clarifying change.

The proviso in subsection (f), in the 1928 act, limiting the credit for taxes paid by foreign subsidiaries, referred to "the credit allowed * * * under this subsection." This reference was incorrect, as the credit was really allowed under subsection (a), and subsection (f) merely operated to increase the credit allowed under (a). In the new bill the reference is omitted, and the limitation is stated as a qualification of the amount of tax deemed to have been paid by the taxpayer through the foreign subsidiary.

SECTION 141. CONSOLIDATED RETURNS OF CORPORATIONS

Subsections (a) and (c): Your committee has added a parenthetical clause which is designed to continue in force (in so far as not inconsistent with the new law) the consolidated returns regulations promulgated under section 141 of the revenue act of 1928 to take care of the companies where returns are filed on a fiscal-year basis prior to the time that consolidated returns regulations can be promulgated under the bill.

The House bill increased the tax of the affiliated group by 1½ per cent in the case a consolidated return was filed. Your committee has eliminated this change and restored the provisions of existing law in this respect as it sees no reason for penalizing corporations for the filing of consolidated returns which accurately reflect the income of the common business enterprise.

Subsection (e): Under existing law life-insurance companies or insurance companies other than life or mutual are not permitted to file consolidated returns with corporations engaged in other lines of business because of the difference in the method of taxing insurance companies as compared with ordinary corporations. The same difficulty has been encountered in connection with life and stock property-insurance companies. For example, the proposed amendment does not permit a life-insurance company to file a consolidated return with a fire-insurance company.

SECTIONS 142 AND 147. CLERICAL

These two sections have been amended to bring their language into accord with the reduction of the personal exemption allowed a single person to $1,000, and the language of section 142 has been further amended to bring its language into accord with the reduction of the personal exemption allowed a married person living with husband or wife to $2,500.

SECTION 143. WITHHOLDING OF TAX AT SOURCE

Subsection (a) has been amended to bring the language in accord with the increase in the normal tax rate from 5 per cent under existing law to 9 per cent and to increase the corporate rate from 12 per cent under existing law to 14 per cent.

Similar changes have been made throughout the section, due to the change in rates and the last proviso in subsection (b), which was inserted in the House bill, has been stricken out due to the action of your committee in restoring the credit for dividends for the purpose of the normal tax.

The provision in existing law permitting deduction and withholding at the rate of 1½ per cent instead of at the rate of 2 per cent in the case of a citizen or resident has been stricken out because under the rates now in effect there is no normal rate of less than 3 per cent.

SECTION 165. EMPLOYEES' TRUSTS

The House bill retained the provisions of existing law under which an employee who receives a distribution from a trust created by an employer as part of a stock bonus, pension, or profit-sharing plan is taxed upon the amount contributed to such fund by the employer plus all earnings of such fund in the year in which distributed or made available to him. In recent years situations have arisen in which the amount contributed to such fund by the employer and all earnings of such fund, together with the amounts contributed to the fund by the employees, have been invested by the trustee in stock of the employer corporation, and at the time of distribution to the employee the market value of the stock was less than the amount contributed to the fund by the employer plus the earnings of the fund.

Your committee believes that it is a distinct hardship to an employee to be taxed under such circumstances as the existing law requires, and corrects the situation by amending section 165 to provide that only the excess of the market value of the stock distributed or made available to the employee over the amounts paid in by him to the trust should be taxable in the year of distribution. This plan renders the employee taxable at the time of distribution upon the excess of the fair market value of the stock received by him over his contributions to the trust regardless of the amount contributed to the trust by the employer. In the case of cash distributions, of course, the present rule is unchanged.

SECTION 166. REVOCABLE TRUSTS

Under the present law the income of a trust is taxable to the grantor where, at any time during the taxable year, the grantor has power to revest in himself title to any part of the corpus of the trust, either alone or in conjunction with any person not a beneficiary of the trust. In an attempt to avoid this section the practice has been adopted by some grantors of reserving power to revest title to the trust corpus in conjunction with a beneficiary having a very minor interest or of conferring the power to revest upon a person other than a beneficiary; in such cases the grantor has substantially the same control as if he alone had power to revoke the trust. While it is, of course, yet to be established that such device accomplishes its purpose, it is considered expedient to make it clear that in any of these cases the income shall be taxed to the grantor. The House bill made the grantor of a trust taxable upon the income of any part of the corpus of the trust where the power to revest in the grantor title to such part of the corpus was in the grantor alone or was in the grantor in conjunction with any person not having a substantial adverse interest in the disposition of such part of the corpus. Your committee has extended the scope of this provision so as to include as well the cases where the power to revest title to any part of the corpus is held, either alone or in conjunction with the grantor, by a person not having a substantial adverse interest in such part of the corpus or in the income therefrom.

SECTION 167. INCOME FOR BENEFIT OF GRANTOR

As in the case of the preceding section, attempted avoidance of the provisions of this section relating to income held or accumulated for the grantor has rendered expedient a change in its wording to clock certain recent practices. The present law taxes the income of a trust to the grantor when, in his discretion, either alone or in conjunction with a person not a beneficiary, the trust income may be held or accumulated for future distribution to him or is or may be applied to the payment of premiums upon insurance policies on the grantor's life. Trusts have been established on which income is held or accumulated for the grantor, which fact, it is contended, removes such trusts from the operation of this section. Here again it is not at all certain that the courts will uphold such devices; yet the statute may well be clarified to remove any doubt that the income of such trusts is to be taxed to the grantors. In the House bill the section has been amended to provide that there shall be taxed to the grantor of a trust any part of the income of the trust which (1) is, or in the grantor's discretion may be, held or accumulated for future distribution to him, or (2) may, in the grantor's discretion, be distributed to him, or (3) is, or in the grantor's discretion may be, applied to the payment of premiums upon policies of insurance on his life. Your committee has further amended the section so as to cover, in addition, cases in which the discretion as to the disposition of the income is in any person not having a substantial adverse interest in the disposition of such income, even though such discretionary power is not shared with the grantor. The House bill added a subsection defining the term "in the discretion of the grantor" so as to include within the purview of the section cases in which the discretion is in the grantor in conjunction with any person not having a substantial adverse interest in the dispositon of the income in question.

SECTIONS 203 (A) AND 204 (C). CLERICAL

Since corporations generally are not allowed a specific credit against net income, the provisions of section 203 (a) (9) and section 204 (c) (10) of the House bill have been eliminated accordingly.

SECTION 203 (A) (2). DEDUCTION FOR RESERVE FUNDS OF LIFE-INSURANCE COMPANIES

Under the existing law, a life-insurance company is permitted to deduct an amount equal to 4 per cent of the mean of its reserve funds held at the beginning and end of the taxable year. In view of the fact that by far the greater part of the reserves for life-insurance policies are maintained at rates less than 4 per cent, the effect of the existing law was to permit companies maintaining their reserves at such lower rates to take deductions substantially in excess of their actual reserve requirements. The House bill accordingly reduced the rate at which this deduction was to be computed from 4 per cent to 3½ per cent, upon the assumption that this uniform rate would not operate arbitrarily. Since many companies, however, maintain policy reserves at rates as high as 4 per cent, the effect of the House bill would be to require such companies to pay taxes upon amounts actually required to maintain their reserves, a result contrary to the general policy of the act. The House bill, moreover, would permit those companies maintaining policy reserves at rates less than 3½ per cent to receive free of tax amounts in excess of their reserve requirements.

In the judgment of your committee, the substantial purpose of the act, to permit a life-insurance company to set aside free of tax the amount of investment income actually required to maintain the policy reserve, is best accomplished by requiring the deduction to be computed at the interest rate at which the policy reserves are actually maintained. Since few, if any, policy reserves are maintained at rates in excess of 4 per cent, the rate at which such deduction may be computed may not exceed 4 per cent. If a company maintains its reserves at different interest rates, the deduction must be computed by applying to each part of the reserve the rate at which such part is maintained.

In the case of combined policies covering life, health, and accident insurance, the deduction, in respect of such reserve funds not required by law as the commissioner finds necessary for the protection of policyholders, is to be computed uniformly at the rate of 3¾ per cent.

SECTION 203 (A) (3). DIVIDENDS TO LIFE-INSURANCE COMPANIES FROM EXEMPT CORPORATIONS

This section has been amended to deny a deduction of dividends received by a life-insurance company from an exempt corporation. This change corresponds to the change made in section 23 (p) (1) with respect to ordinary corporations.

SECTION 203 (B). RENTAL VALUE OF REAL ESTATE

Under existing law a life-insurance company is required, as a condition to the allowance of the deductions for depreciation, taxes, and other expenses pertaining to real estate owned and occupied by it, to include in its gross income the rental value of the space occupied by it; such rental value must be not less than a sum which, together with rents from other tenants, will yield a net return of 4 per cent of the book value of the real estate. The Board of Tax Appeals has held that this limitation or condition upon the deduction is unconstitutional, and that the company may still deduct the entire amount of depreciation, taxes, and other expenses upon the whole property notwithstanding there is included in gross income rent from only a part of the property. Without regard to the legality of the present provisions, your committee believes that these provisions would operate somewhat severely in the present depressed condition of real estate, and that it is more equitable merely to disallow so much of these deductions as pertain to the part of the property which is occupied by the company than to allow such deductions in full upon condition of including in gross income a more or less arbitrary determination of rental value.

The bill as reported accordingly provides for the allowance of a proportionate part of the depreciation, taxes, and other expenses pertaining to real estate owned and occupied by the company, to be determined by the proportion which the rental value of the space not occupied by the company bears to the rental value of the entire property. Such rental value, instead of being fixed by a definite statutory formula, will be determined in accordance with the circumstances in each case.

SECTION 204 (B) (1). DEFINITION OF GROSS INCOME—INSURANCE COMPANIES OTHER THAN LIFE OR MUTUAL

Some question has arisen as to the adequacy of the definition in prior acts of the gross income of insurance companies other than life or mutual. Under a recent decision of the Supreme Court, some of the title-guaranty and mortgage-guaranty companies are taxable as insurance companies, and since a substantial part of their income might not be classed as either underwriting or investment income, it might not come within the definition of gross income contained in this section. As such companies are allowed the same deductions as are allowed to ordinary corporations, in addition to the purely insurance deductions provided in section 204, they would be in the highly favored position of being taxed upon only part of their income while being allowed all of their expenses, losses, and other deductions. Moreover, this definition, even in the case of the other type of insurance companies taxable under this section, may not include some miscellaneous forms of income which should be subject to tax. The bill accordingly requires the inclusion in gross income of insurance companies taxable under section 204 of all items constituting gross income under section 22 other than items of the character already specified in section 204.

SECTION 208 (C). DEDUCTIONS OF MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANIES OTHER THAN LIFE

The amendment to paragraph (1) (B) is merely for clarification. The use of the term "paid or incurred," which is defined in section 48, insures the determination of the deductions under this paragraph in accordance with the method of accounting employed by the taxpayer.

Paragraph (3) in the existing law allows to mutual insurance companies (other than life and marine) a deduction for premium deposits returned to policyholders and premium deposits retained for the payment of losses, expenses, and reinsurance reserves, in addition to the deductions for losses and expenses paid or incurred, allowed by other provisions of this section. Thus, it may be argued that an insurance company in this class may deduct what is virtually the same item several times over in different taxable years. Since deductions are already allowed for all losses and expenses as paid or incurred, there is no reason for any further deduction under this paragraph for premium deposits retained to meet such losses and expenses. The bill accordingly restricts the additional deductions allowed under paragraph (3) to returned premium deposits (as under existing law) and a reasonable net addition to reinsurance reserves, if not otherwise allowed.

SECTION 214. CREDITS AGAINST NET INCOME OF A NONRESIDENT ALIEN INDIVIDUAL

The personal exemption allowed by this section is reduced from $1,500 to $1,000 in accordance with the policy expressed in section 25 (c) of the bill.

SECTION 236. TIME FOR PAYMENT OF TAX BY FOREIGN CORPORATIONS

Under existing law foreign corporations on a calendar-year basis having any office or place of business in the United States are not required to pay their income taxes until June 15, following the close of the calendar year, although their returns must be filed on March 15. Your committee sees no reason why such corporation should not pay their income taxes at the same time that their returns are due, which is the rule applied in the case of domestic corporations, and the amendment so provides.

SECTION 251 (E). CREDIT AGAINST NET INCOME FROM SOURCES WITHIN POSSESSIONS OF THE UNITED STATES

The credit allowed under this section has been limited to a personal exemption credit of $1,000 in the case of a citizen of the United States entitled to the benefits of section 251, and the provisions of the House bill relating to the $1,000 specific credit in the case of domestic corporations entitled to the benefits of this section have been removed in view of the elimination from section 26 of the bill of any specific credit in the case of domestic corporations.

SECTION 261 (A). CLERICAL

The word "credits" in subsection (a) of this section in existing law has been changed to "credit," due to the elimination by this committee of the specific credit allowed corporations under section 26 of existing law.

TITLE II.—ADDITIONAL ESTATE TAX

SECTION 401. IMPOSITION OF TAX

Under the House bill an additional estate tax is imposed equal to the excess of the amount of a tentative tax over the tax computed under existing law prior to the allowance of the 80 per cent credit. The tentative tax begins with net estates not in excess of $10,000 at the rate of 1 per cent and the rates increased up to 45 per cent in the case of net estates in excess of $10,000,000. The $100,000 exemption allowed under existing law in computing net estates is decreased to $50,000 for the purpose of determining the tentative tax. Estates of decedents subject to the tax imposed under existing law will also be subject to the tax imposed by this section. In some cases estates which are not liable to the tax under existing law will nevertheless be liable for the tax imposed under this section, due to the lowering of the exemption from $100,000 to $50,000. In order to make it clear that the tax will apply in such cases your committee has stricken out the words "an additional" before "tax" in this section and substituted the word "a."

SECTION 402. CREDITS AGAINST TAX

Subsection (a) of this section makes it clear that the additional estate tax shall not be subject to the credit for State death taxes to which the estate tax imposed by section 301 (a) of the revenue act of 1926 is subject.

Subsection (b) of this section authorizes as a credit against the additional estate tax, subject to the limitations provided in section 301 (b) of the revenue act of 1926, as amended, gift taxes paid under Title III of the pending bill, but such credit is not to be in excess of the amount by which the gift tax exceeds the amount of credit authorized by section 301 (b) of the revenue act of 1926, as amended.

SECTION 403. ASSESSMENT, COLLECTION, AND PAYMENT OF TAX

The additional estate tax (except as provided in sec. 402) is to be assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner, and subject to the same provisions as the estate tax imposed by existing law.

This section imposes the same requirements upon the filing of returns as prescribed in existing law, except that a return is not required in the case of a resident decedent if the value of the gross estate at the time of the decedent's death does not exceed $50,000.

Your committee adds a clarifying amendment to make it plain that a nonresident decedent is required to file a return as provided in existing law even though the gross estate is less than $50,000.

TITLE III.—GIFT TAX

Except for the administrative provisions, which are taken either from the estate tax or the income tax titles of the revenue acts of 1926 and 1928 and incorporated in this title (a resort to the expedient of the incorporation of administrative provisions by reference, as was done in the gift tax law of the revenue act of 1924, being thought unsatisfactory), the aim in framing this title has been to state with brevity and in general terms the provisions of a substantive character.

The tax applies only to gifts made by individuals and in the case of a nonresident alien only to gifts of property situated within the United States. Your committee has amended the House bill to tax gifts made by citizens of the United States of any property wherever situated regardless of whether the donors are residents or nonresidents.

The terms "property," "transfer," "gift," and "indirectly" are used in the broadest and most comprehensive sense; the term "property" reaching every species of right or interest protected by law and having an exchangeable value.

The words "transfer * * * by gift" and "whether * * * direct or indirect" are designed to cover and comprehend all transactions (subject to certain express conditions and limitations) whereby and to the extent (sec. 503) that property or a property right is donatively passed to or conferred upon another, regardless of the means or the device employed in its accomplishment. For example, (1) a transfer of property by a corporation without a consideration, or one less than adequate and fully in money or money's worth, to B would constitute a gift from the stockholders of the corporation to B; (2) a transfer by A to a corporation owned by his children would constitute a gift to the children; (3) a transfer of property to B where there is imposed upon B the obligation of paying a commensurate annuity to C would be a gift to C; (4) the payment of money or the transfer of property to B in consideration whereof he is to render a service to C would constitute a gift to C or gifts both to B and to C, depending on whether the service to be rendered by B to C was or was not an adequate and full consideration in money or money's worth for that which was received by B; (5) the forgiveness or payment by A of B's indebtedness would constitute a gift to B; (6) where A creates a joint bank account for himself and B there would be a gift to B when he draws upon the account for his own benefit to the extent of the amount drawn out; (7) where A creates a revocable trust, naming B as beneficiary, a gift to B of the corpus is effected when A relinquishes the power to revoke or the power is otherwise terminated in B's favor (the income payment to B in the interim being gifts from A in the calendar years when received).

SECTION 502. COMPUTATION OF TAX

The computation of the tax payable each year involves three operations, namely:

(1) A computation of the tax at the graduated rates on all gifts (with certain express exceptions) made after the enactment of this act, including gifts made in the current calendar year; (2) a computation of the tax at the graduated rates on the gifts made in the prior year or years; (3) the subtraction of the result of the second computation from that of the first. This computation results in a tax imposed on a cumulative basis. In short, the design is to impose a tax which measurably approaches the estate tax which would have been payable on the donor's death had the gifts not been made and the property given had constituted his estate at his death. The tax will reach gifts not reached, for one reason or another, by the estate tax.

The gift tax will supplement both the estate tax and the income tax. It will tend to reduce the incentive to make gifts in order that distribution of future income from the donated property may be to a number of persons, with the result that the taxes imposed by the higher brackets of the income tax law are avoided. It will also tend to discourage transfers for the purpose of avoiding the estate tax.

An objection urged against the former gift tax (that imposed by the revenue act of 1924) was that it might be readily evaded by spreading the gifts over a period of years. Under that tax a person could in each year make gifts equal to the deductions, including the specific exemption, and thus escape the tax entirely. Where taxable gifts were spread over a number of years, the combined effect of the annual specific exemption and of the graduated rates resulted in the aggregate of the gift taxes imposed being much less than what the tax would have been had all the gifts been made in a single year. If a gift tax is to yield a material revenue it is necessary that it be imposed on a cumulative basis, as is the proposed tax. Since the gift tax is an adjunct of the estate tax which is not restricted to transfers made within a single year, an effective gift tax must give consideration, so far as the rate of tax is concerned, to transfers made in prior years.

The theory upon which the gift tax is based is that the rate of tax is measured by all gifts made after the enactment of the bill. This scheme is adopted in order to tax gifts made over a period of years at the same rate as if they had all been made within one year. For a more effective administration and to secure prompt collection of the revenues, the bill provides that the tax shall be computed and collected annually.

The gift-tax rates have been adjusted to conform to the increase in estate-tax rates in the bill.

SECTION 503. TRANSFERS FOR LESS THAN ADEQUATE AND FULL CONSIDERATION

Since the tax is designed to reach all transfers to the extent that they are donative, and to exclude any consideration not reducible to money or money's worth, it is provided in this section that where the transfer is made for less than an adequate and full consideration in money or money's worth, the excess in value of the property transferred over such consideration shall be deemed a gift. For example, if A sells property worth $10,000 to B for $1,000, there is a gift of $9,000.

SECTION 504. NET GIFTS

By subsection (b) of the House bill a gift or gifts to any one person during the calendar year, if in the amount or of the value of $3,000 or less, was not to be accounted for in determining the total amount of gifts of that or any subsequent calendar year. Likewise, the first $3,000 of a gift to any one person exceeding that amount is not to be accounted for. Your committee believed the exemption was insufficient, and accordingly increased it to $5,000. Such exemption, on the one hand, is to obviate the necessity of keeping an account of and reporting numerous small gifts, and, on the other, to fix the amount sufficiently large to cover in most cases wedding and Christmas gifts and occasional gifts of relatively small amounts. The exemption does not apply with respect to a gift to any donee to whom is given a future interest. The term "future interests in property" refers to any interest or estate, whether vested or contingent, limited to commence in possession or enjoyment at a future date. The exemption being available only in so far as the donees are ascertainable, the denial of the exemption in the case of gifts of future interests is dictated by the apprehended difficulty, in many instances, of determining the number of eventual donees and the values of their respective gifts.

SECTION 505. DEDUCTIONS

Against gifts made by a resident donor there is allowed a specific exemption of $50,000, corresponding to the specific exemption in the estate tax law. This exemption, at the option of the donor, may be taken all in one year or spread over a period of years, but after the $50,000 exemption has been used up no further exemption is allowed. For neither the gift tax nor the estate tax is a specific exemption allowed in the case of a nonresident.

The provisions authorizing deductions for charitable and similar gifts are patterned after those in the income tax law, and are broader than the corresponding provisions in the estate tax law.

A clarifying change has been made in this section by your committee to bring it into harmony with the policy of your committee to tax gifts made by nonresident citizens of property located outside the United States.

SECTION 506. GIFTS MADE IN PROPERTY

The word "property" in the gift tax law includes money, so that pursuant to this section a gift of a rare coin would be measured by the value of the coin at the time of the gift.

SECTION 507. RETURNS

This section requires that returns disclosing gifts shall be filed on or before the 15th day of March following the close of the calendar year in which any gift in excess of $5,000 is made to any one individual.

SECTION 508. RECORDS AND SPECIAL RETURNS

This section is modeled after similar income-tax provisions.

SECTION 509. PAYMENT OF TAX

The tax is payable on or before the due date of the return.

SECTION 510. LIEN FOR TAX

By this section there is imposed a lien additional to that imposed by section 3186 of the Revised Statutes in that it attaches to the property transferred by gift as of the time of transfer.

SECTIONS 511 TO 527. GENERAL ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

These sections, relating to the determination and collection of the tax, are modeled after either corresponding provisions of the estate tax law or the income tax law, whichever have been found most adaptable.

Your committee has added to the House bill a section providing a penalty for willfully attempting in any manner to defeat or evade the gift tax; this penalty corresponds to the penalty imposed by the income-tax statutes for the same offense.

SECTION 528. REFUNDS AND CREDITS

A donor liable to a gift tax may have overpaid his gift tax for some other year. This section gives recognition to this fact and is modeled after the income-tax provisions which specifically authorize the crediting of an overpayment for one year against a liability for another and the refunding of any balance which is not so credited.

SECTION 529. LAWS MADE APPLICABLE

This is a standard provision.

SECTION 530. RULES AND REGULATIONS

Pursuant to this section rules and regulations for the enforcement of the gift tax law are to be prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

SECTION 531. DEFINITIONS

The gift tax may not constitutionally apply to gifts made prior to the date of the enactment of the act imposing the tax. This limitation is, for convenience, incorporated in the definition of the term "calendar year."

The definition in subsection (b) follows a similar definition in the estate tax law.

TITLE IV.—MANUFACTURERS' EXCISE TAXES

Section 601 imposes taxes on the importation of certain articles. In order that the imposition of these taxes shall not operate as an abrogation of the Cuban reciprocity treaty, subsections (a) and (b) (5) are amended so that the taxes shall be subject to the exemption from duty or to the preferential rate granted Cuban products.

The taxes imposed under this section on imported articles are to be collected by the Customs Service in the same manner as customs duties, and all provisions of the customs administrative laws, with certain specific exceptions, are made applicable. Subsection (b) (4) is amended so that the drawback privilege will be applicable to imported coal, lumber, copper, and rubber, as well as imported oil.

Your committee recommends striking out of subsection (c) (1), relating to lubricating oils, the viscosity range in the House bill. Oils within the limits of the House bill can be produced by mixing lighter and heavier oils, and consumers could avoid the tax by such mixture. Since lubricating oils are also covered by the committee's substitute for paragraph (4), relating to imported petroleum and products thereof, a provision has been written into paragraph (1) to limit it to sales by domestic manufacturers.

The tax on brewer's wort is increased to 15 cents a gallon. It is believed that this commodity can easily bear this rate and that a substantial increase in revenue will result. The malt sirup rate of 35 cents a gallon in the House bill is changed to 3 cents a pound, which is approximately equivalent. This change is recommended for the reason that the products to which it applies are sold by the pound rather than by the gallon. The exemptions contained in the House bill are extended to include malt sirup sold by the manufacturer for use by the purchaser in the manufacture of foods, cereal beverages, and textiles. The paragraph has been rewritten for clarity.

The rate under paragraph (3) on grape concentrate, etc., has been fixed at 20 cents a gallon, instead of 40 per cent of the price or duty-paid value as in the House bill. Exemptions comparable to those in the malt sirup paragraph have been added.

The rate on imported crude petroleum, fuel oil, and gas oil under paragraph (4) has been reduced from 1 cent a gallon to ½-cent a gallon. The rate on gasoline has been increased from 1 cent to 2½ cents, and compensatory duties on lubricating oils, other liquid derivatives of petroleum, paraffin, and other petroleum wax products, asphalt, and bitumen have been inserted.

The coal paragraph has been broadened to cover all sizes, grades, and classifications of coal. A provision has been added to exempt imports from any country which during the preceding year has imported from the United States a greater quantity of these products than it has exported to the United States.

The proposed paragraph (6) imposes a tax of $3 per thousand board feet on imports of lumber, and the proposed paragraph (7) imposes a duty of 4 cents a pound on the copper content of imported ores and concentrates, and the materials and semimanufactured articles enumerated in paragraphs 316, 380, 381, 387, 1620, 1634, 1657, 1658, or 1659 of the tariff act. Compensatory rates are provided for other articles containing copper.

A duty of 5 cents a pound on imported rubber and gutta-percha, and the rubber and gutta-percha content of imported articles is proposed as a purely revenue-producing measure.

Sections 602 to 604, inclusive, 606, 608 to 613, inclusive, and 615, imposing taxes on toilet preparations, etc., furs, jewelry, etc., boats, mechanical refrigerators, sporting goods, firearms, shells and cartridges, cameras, matches, candy, and soft drinks, are striken from the bill.

The rate on passenger automobile bodies and chassis has been increased from 3 to 4 per cent, on truck bodies and chassis from 2 to 3 per cent, and on parts and accessories from 1 to 2 per cent. In view of the import tax on rubber, tires and inner tubes not sold on or in connection with the sale of a truck or other automobile have been exempted from the tax on parts and accessories. The House bill contained a provision, which is retained by your committee, to eliminate the effect of certain court decisions under which many parts and accessories have escaped tax under prior revenue acts on the ground that they were not "primarily adapted" for use on automobiles or trucks, since they might be used on boats, tractors, etc. Under the bill spark plugs, storage batteries, leaf springs, coils, timers, and tire chains, if suitable for use on automobiles and trucks, will be taxable as parts or accessories whether or not "primarily adapted" for such use. As to other parts and accessories, the test of taxability will be the same as under the prior laws, since those enumerated represent the principal items as to which question has arisen, and to extend the list would result in the inclusion of articles whose use on automobiles and trucks may be minor as compared with their other uses.

A provision is inserted to allow a body manufacturer to sell bodies tax free to an automobile or truck manufacturer for resale by him, and the vendee is made liable for the tax on the body when he sells the completed automobile or truck.

Subsection (e) as proposed will allow a refund of tax paid on automobiles, trucks, parts, and accessories in the hands of dealers when the tax ceases to be in effect. To offset this concession an amendment is made to the section relating to the effective date, so that the tax on these articles will be in effect one month longer than the other excise taxes imposed by the bill.

No change is made in the tax on radio receiving sets, etc. The rate on chewing gum has been reduced from 5 to 3 per cent.

Section 616 of the House bill, retained as section 605, provides that the lease of an article shall be considered the sale of an article, so that the tax can not be evaded by a lease contract which does not involve passage of title.

Sections 617 and 618 of the House bill have been eliminated and a more complete set of administrative provisions inserted in their place.

Section 619 of the House bill, transferring the tax to the vendee in the case of contracts made before March 1, 1932, retained as section 611, is amended by substituting the date of May 1, 1932, for March 1, 1932, as the date as of which vendors may be fairly considered to have had notice of the likelihood of the imposition of the taxes. This seems equitable in view of the fact that the rates carried in the bill as passed by the House and reported to the Senate are higher than those in the bill as reported to the House, which contained the date of March 1. A provision is inserted to prevent transfer of the tax to the vendee when the vendor has agreed to assume it. Another amendment provides for a report by the vendor to the commissioner when the vendee refuses to pay the tax to the vendor.

The section relating to rules and regulations has been amended to make it clear that the rules and regulations relating to the taxes on importations shall be prescribed in the same manner as the customs regulations.

TITLE V.—MISCELLANEOUS TAXES

PART I. TAX ON TELEGRAPH, TELEPHONE, RADIO, AND CABLE FACILITIES

The House bill provided for rates applicable to all telegraph, telephone, cable, and radio dispatches, messages, and conversations as follows: If the charge is more than 30 cents and less than 50 cents, a tax of 5 cents; if the charge is 50 cents or more, a tax of 10 cents. Your committee believes that these different classes of services call for different treatment, and proposes the following rates:

Telephone conversations costing 50 cents or more and less than $1, 10 cents; costing $1 or more and less than $2, 15 cents; costing $2 or more, 20 cents.

Telegraph dispatches and messages, 5 per cent of the charge.

Cable and radio dispatches and messages, 10 cents each.

The tax on leased wires and talking circuit special services is reduced from 10 per cent to 5 per cent.

The exemptions in favor of radio broadcasting companies and newspapers have been eliminated.

Provision has been inserted for extension of the due date of the taxes for not more than 90 days. The companies affected deal with large numbers of small accounts which are likely not to be paid for 60 or 90 days, and the extension privilege will enable them to defer the return until the amounts are collected and still have the return correspond with one month's entries on their books. This will be a convenience both to the Government and the taxpayers.

The provisions which are incorporated in the new Part VII on administrative provisions have been stricken from Part I.

PART II. ADMISSIONS TAX

The House bill reduced the exemption on admissions from $3 or less to 45 cents or less. Your committee proposes to reduce this exemption to 10 cents or less. This will yield $70,000,000 for the fiscal year 1933 more than the House bill.

The House made the rate on prize fights and other pugilistic matches or exhibitions the same as for admissions in general, as compared with 25 per cent on admissions over $5, under the present law. The higher rate has led to evasion of the tax, and it is believed that the reduction will result in an increase in the number of legitimate charges over $5 and a gain in the revenue from this source.

The rate on admissions to horse and dog races has been made 25 per cent.

The tax on charges by ticket brokers in excess of the established price is made a straight 10 per cent, the amendment of existing law made by the House bill being retained. The present law imposes a tax of 5 per cent on the first 75 cents of the excess over the established price and 50 per cent of the amount by which the additional charge exceeds 75 cents. It is believed that the present law penalizes brokers engaged in a legitimate business, that it has failed of its purposes, and that the proposed rate will about double the revenue.

The exemption of admissions the proceeds of which inure to the benefit of religious, educational, charitable, and like institutions and organizations has been subject to much abuse with respect to wrestling matches and prize fights and other pugilistic matches and exhibitions.

The House bill provided that this exemption should not be granted in the case of such matches or exhibitions, and that colleges and universities should not have benefit of the exemption. Your committee is opposed to the taxation of college sports and has amended section 711 (c) accordingly.

A new section exempting admissions to the 1932 Olympic games has been added.

PART III. STAMP TAXES

Section 721 of the House bill, increasing the rate of tax on bond issues from 5 cents to 10 cents, has been amended to exempt certain annuity contracts which have been held taxable under existing law as "corporate securities."

Amendments have been made to section 722, providing for a like increase of tax on stock issues, to make it clear that the basis of computation of the tax remains the par value of the certificate as distinguished from the shares. Similar amendments are made in section 723, relating to stock transfers.

Your committee has stricken out the provision of the House bill providing that the tax on stock transfers should not be less than one-fourth of 1 per cent of the selling price, if any. It is believed that this is a burdensome rate and that the provision would cause administrative difficulties.

The House bill eliminated the provision of existing law exempting loans of stock. Your committee has restored this exemption, since the loaning of stock is essential to the carrying out of many legitimate transactions, such as the sale of stock by those living at a distance from the stock exchange.

An exemption of transfers from a fiduciary to a nominee and between nominees of the same fiduciary has been added.

Section 722 (b) of the House bill, intended to prevent evasion of the tax by resort to foreign exchanges, has been eliminated. With the reduction in the rate, the danger which subsection (b) was intended to meet will not exist.

Section 724, imposing a tax on bond transfers, has been amended by changing the rate from 2 cents to 4 cents per $100 of face value or fraction thereof, and by striking out the provision that the tax shall not be less than one-eighth of 1 per cent of the selling price, if any. Your committee believes that the enforcement of a percentage rate would be especially difficult in the case of transfers of bonds, only a relatively small number of which are made on exchanges.

An amendment is inserted to make it clear that bonds exempt from the tax on issuance, such as Federal, State, and municipal bonds, are not to be subject to the transfer tax.

Transfers of bonds in connection with tax-free corporate reorganizations and transfers of bonds from a fiduciary to a nominee and between nominees of the same fiduciary are exempted.

Section 725, imposing a tax on conveyances similar to that imposed by Schedule A of the revenue act of 1924, has been amended to exempt deeds which were deposited in escrow before April 1, 1932.

Under the House bill the stamp tax on sales of produce for future delivery imposed by subdivision 4 of Schedule A of Title VIII of the revenue act of 1926 is increased from 1 cent to 5 cents. Your committee has stricken out of the bill the proposed increase.

PART IV. TAX ON TRANSPORTATION OF OIL BY PIPE LINE

The rate under section 731 on transportation of oil by pipe line has been reduced from 8 to 3 per cent. The word "oil" has been changed to "crude petroleum and liquid products thereof." This will make transportation of gasoline as well as crude oil taxable.

Amendments have been made to impose the tax on the pipe line rather than the person paying for the transportation. The provisions covered by the new Part VII have been stricken out.

PART V. TAX ON CHECKS, ETC.

Your committee has inserted a tax of 2 cents on each bank check or draft, to raise $95,000,000 in the fiscal year 1933. This tax is to be collected by the bank from its customers by charges against their accounts. This method of collection is expected to be much less of a nuisance and expense to both the banks and their customers than a stamp tax would be. It will eliminate the necessity of the banks carrying stocks of stamps and stamped checks and the waste occasioned by their redemption and destruction when the tax ceases to be in effect.

The former Part V, tax on leases of safe-deposit boxes, has been stricken out.

PART VI. TAX ON CIGARETTE PAPERS

Under existing law cigarette papers in books of 25 or less are exempt from tax. This is to permit free distribution of such books with packages of tobacco. This privilege is being abused and the tax evaded by giving with one package of tobacco two or more books of 25 papers each. To eliminate this practice the exemption of the small books is eliminated and the tax is made applicable to withdrawals for consumption or sale as well as to sales.

PART VII. ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

To eliminate duplication the administrative provisions applicable to the new taxes imposed by Title V have been combined in Part VII.

TITLE VI.—ESTATE TAX AMENDMENTS

SECTION 801. CREDIT OF GIFT TAX ON ESTATE TAX

This section authorizes a credit for gift taxes against the estate tax where any property subject to the gift tax is required to be included in the donor's gross estate on his death.

This credit provision is substantially the same as section 322 of the revenue act of 1924 (relating to the gift tax imposed by that act), with the addition of the exception stated in the latter portion of paragraph (1).

This added exception is inserted in view of the fact that, on account of the graduated rates, the total gifts subject to gift taxes (some of which may be included for estate-tax purposes and some not) may be larger than the net estate subject to estate tax, and the estate-tax rate lower than the gift-tax rate. For example, the gifts may amount to $10,000,000, of which $1,000,000 may be subject to estate tax and the property owned by the donor when he died may amount to $500,000 (after deductions); thus the net estate would be $1,500,000 and the estate-tax rate considerably lower than the gift-tax rate. Such a situation would result in complete exemption of the estate from estate tax if it were not for the exception mentioned. The exception is designed to obviate this result by limiting the credit as provided in this section. The parenthetical clause, a part of the exception, is required by the fact that only the "lower" value is subject to both the gift and the estate tax. For example, if the gift-tax value is $600,000 and the estate-tax value $1,000,000, the lower value ($600,000) is the only one which has been the subject of both taxes. The excess ($400,000) has been the subject of estate tax only.

Paragraph (2) is required to indicate the amount of gift taxes for which credit is allowable where there are gifts in a calendar year which are included in the donor's gross estate for estate-tax purposes, and other gifts for the same year which are not so included.

SECTION 802. EIGHTY PER CENT CREDIT

A credit against the estate tax for State death taxes paid was first authorized by the revenue act of 1924 (sec. 301 (b)), where the credit was permitted up to 25 per cent of the estate tax. This percentage was increased in the revenue act of 1926 (sec. 301 (b)) to 80 per cent. Under existing law the credit includes only such State death taxes as are actually paid and credit therefor claimed within three years after the filing of the estate-tax return. This restriction has worked unfairly in certain instances, particularly where appeals to the Board of Tax Appeals have had the effect of postponing the final determination of the amount of the estate tax and consequently the State death taxes until after the expiration of the 3-year period.

The principal amendment made by this section is designed to effect an appropriate extension of the period for paying State death taxes and claiming credit therefor.

Subsection (a) of this section amends subdivision (b) of section 301 of the revenue act of 1926. The changes are:

(1) A clarifying provision to remove any basis of a claim for credit for State death taxes paid with respect to another person's estate, where the property is included in the decedent's estate.

(2) A specific provision that the 80 per cent limitation be computed after credit is made for the gift tax; that is, that the gift tax is first to be credited against the Federal estate tax, and the credit for State death taxes is limited to 80 per cent of the balance.

(3) An extension of the period for paying State death taxes and claiming credit from three to four years after the filing of the return.

(4) A provision in substance allowing the estate the entire period during which the case is before the board, and 60 days thereafter to pay State death taxes and claim credit therefor. Many of the States have passed estate tax laws, designed to procure for the State the difference between 80 per cent of the Federal estate tax and the ordinary State inheritance taxes. In actual practice the State tax authorities decline (in many cases under the express provisions of State law are unable) to determine the State estate tax until the Federal estate tax is fixed. If the estate files a petition with the board, it may be very much longer than three or four years after the filing of the return before the board or the courts to which appeals are taken render a final decision.

(5) A provision to the effect that, if the estate procures an extension of time to pay the tax (on account of undue hardship), a similar extension is granted for paying State death taxes and claiming credit therefor.

(6) A provision to the effect that a refund based on the credit may be made if claim therefor is filed within the above period, despite the provisions of section 319.

The interest provision is designed to prevent the allowance of interest, accruing after enactment of the pending bill, on any refund due to the State death-tax credit. In some instances interest on the 80 per cent refunded would equal or exceed the 20 per cent, which the Federal Government is permitted to retain.

Subsection (b) of this section makes it clear that where the right to a credit for State death taxes is barred at the time of the enactment of this act such right is not revived by any provision of this section, except that by a committee amendment to this subsection the right to claim a credit for State death taxes (within the period provided in subsection (a)) is saved to estates which have filed petitions with the Board of Tax Appeals within the time specified by statute.

SECTION 803. FUTURE INTERESTS

The purpose of this amendment to section 302 (c) of the revenue act of 1926 is to clarify in certain respects the amendments made to that section by the joint resolution of March 3, 1931, which were adopted to render taxable a transfer under which the decedent reserved the income for his life. The joint resolution was designed to avoid the effect of decisions of the Supreme Court holding such a transfer not taxable if irrevocable and not made in contemplation of death. Certain new matter has also been added, which is without retroactive effect.

The changes are:

(1) The insertion of the words "or for any period not ascertainable without reference to his death" is to reach, for example, a transfer where decedent reserved to himself semiannual payments of the income of a trust which he had established, but with the provision that no part of the trust income between the last semiannual payment to him and his death should be paid to him or his estate, or where he reserves the income, not necessarily for the remainder of his life but for a period in the ascertainment of which the date of his death was a necessary element.

(2) The insertion of the words "or for any period which does not in fact end before his death," which is to reach, for example, a transfer where decedent, 70 years old, reserves the income for an extended term of years and dies during the term, or where he is to have the income from and after the death of another person until his own death, and such other person predeceases him. This is a clarifying change and does not represent new matter.

(3) The insertion of the words "the right to the income" in place of the words "the income" is designed to reach a case where decedent had the right to the income, though he did not actually receive it. This is also a clarifying change.

(4) The insertion of the words "either alone or in conjunction with any person" is to reach a case where decedent had a right, with the concurrence of another person or persons, to designate those who should possess or enjoy the property or the income therefrom.

The amendments to section 302 (f) and section 315 (b) of the revenue act of 1926 are to bring these sections into agreement with section 302 (c) of the 1926 act, as amended, in the respects above indicated.

SECTION 804. RELINQUISHMENT OF DOWER, ETC., AS CONSIDERATION

This amendment excludes, in determining "consideration in money or money's worth," the value of a relinquished, or a promised relinquishment of, dower, curtesy, or other marital rights in decedent's property. Section 302 (a) and (b) of the 1926 act require the value of such an interest to be included in the gross estate, and, if its value may, in whole or in part, constitute a consideration for an otherwise taxable transfer (as has been held to be so), or an otherwise unallowable deduction from the gross estate, the effect produced amounts to a subversion of the legislative intent expressed in section 302 (a) and (b).

For example, a decedent dies leaving an estate of $1,500,000 (after payment of all charges), and under the State law the surviving spouse is entitled to one-third, or $500,000, of which she can not be deprived by will without her consent. Under existing law the estate is entitled to no deduction on account of her statutory rights, but, if she and decedent had entered into a contract by which she was to receive from his estate a stated sum in consideration of a waiver of her statutory rights, the amount due her under the contract might be held a deductible claim against the estate as having been contracted for an adequate and full consideration in money's worth, namely, the value of her waived marital rights.

SECTION 805. DEDUCTIONS

This amendment, with one exception, merely clarifies the existing law so far as it relates to an important group of deductions allowable in computing the net estate subject to estate tax. The principal changes made are:

(1) A more definite statement that, in order for a mortgage to be deducted, the full value of the mortgaged property must be included in the gross estate. This change is merely for clarification.

(2) A clarifying provision to remove any question as to the deductibility of property taxes which did not accrue until after decedent's death. Such taxes are not claims nor administration expenses, and moreover are allowed for income-tax purposes.

(3) A change has been made in connection with the allowances of losses during the settlement of the estate as deduotions to correspond with the change made under section 23 (e) of the income-tax title.

(4) A clarifying provision limiting the requirement of an adequate and full consideration in money or money's worth to liabilities founded on contract. The existing law might be open to a construction under which no claim against the estate would be deductible unless supported by an "adequate and full consideration in money or money's worth," but the real intent could hardly have been to deny the deduction of liabilities imposed by law or arising out of torts, and the amendment whereby the requirement of a consideration applies only where the liability is founded on contract is designed to clear up any doubt which may be thought to exist.

SECTION 806. PRIOR TAXED PROPERTY

Under existing law, where two decedents die within five years of each other, if the first estate pays a tax and there is included in the second estate property which was also included in the first estate, deduction is allowed to the second estate on account of the property previously taxed. A similar provision is made for a deduction to an estate where the decedent received property by gift within five years prior to his death and a gift tax was paid upon such gift. Since the same rules apply in the two classes of cases, and this amendment has a common application, the explanations which follow will, for convenience, deal only with the situation of two decedents dying within five years of each other.

The principal changes in existing law made by this amendment are:

(1) Provision for reducing the deduction where a mortgage or other lien was allowed as a deduction to the first estate but was paid in whole or in part prior to the second decedent's death. For example, there may have been included in the first estate an item of property valued at $100,000, against which a deduction was allowed for a mortgage thereon of $25,000 (the only value actually taxed being $75,000). The mortgage was paid between the two deaths and the property included in the second estate at $100,000. A literal interpretation of the existing law might seem to require a deduction to the second estate of the full value of the property, though the prior estate paid a tax on the equity of redemption only.

(2) Provision for reducing the deduction for prior taxed property on account of other deductions, such as claims against the estate, administration expenses, charitable bequests, and the specific exemption. The words "and not deducted under paragraphs (1) and (3) of this subdivision" were inserted in section 403 (a) (3) of the revenue act of 1921 to prevent a double deduction, but that purpose has not been entirely accomplished. Under existing law, if the decedent received from the first decedent bonds valued at $100,000, and specifically bequeathed those bonds to charity, only one deduction would be allowed. However, if instead of specifically bequeathing the bonds, he gave charity a general legacy of $100,000, which could be satisfied out of property other than the bonds, two deductions would be allowed. Under the amendment, the allowable deduction in the two examples is the same, namely, the full amount of the charitable bequest and a pro rata part of the prior taxed property.

(3) Provision to the effect that where the prior taxed property consists of two or more items the aggregate value is to be used in computing the deduction. Under existing law, where there is a variance in the value of any items of property between the date of death of the first decedent and the date of death of the second decedent, the lower value of each item is used for the purpose of computing the deduction. Under the amendment the lower of the two totals, instead of the lower of each item, is used. For example, if one item is valued at $8,000 in the first estate and at $10,000 in the second estate, $8,000 is deducted as prior taxed property. If another item is valued at $12,000 in the first estate and at $9,000 in the second estate, $9,000 is deducted. It will be noted that the total of the two lower values is $17,000, which is the amount deducted as prior taxed property under existing law for the two items. The total of the two items in the first estate is $20,000, and in the second estate $19,000. Under the amendment $19,000 will be deductible as prior taxed property.

SECTION 807. DEDUCTION OF BEQUESTS, ETC., TO CHARITY

The purpose of this amendment is to limit the deduction for charitable bequests, etc., to the amount which the decedent has in fact and in law devised or bequeathed to charity. Under existing law no consideration can be given to any estate, succession, legacy, or inheritance taxes imposed with respect to a decedent's estate even though by the terms of his will or the local law they actually reduce the amount of such bequest or devise. It is evident that where the decedent gives his residuary estate to charity, but by his will directs that such taxes shall be paid therefrom, all that he gives to charity and all that charity is entitled to receive is the residuary estate reduced by the amount of the taxes charged against it; the residuary estate being what is left after the subtraction of such taxes and other charges and prior bequests. This is equally true where, in the absence of such a direction in the will, such taxes under the local law are payable out of the residuary estate.

This amendment restores the sentence appearing in sections 303 (a) (3) and 303 (b) (3) of the revenue act of 1924, which was retroactively repealed by section 323 of the revenue act of 1926.

The Supreme Court on February 18, 1924, in the case of Edwards v. Slocum (264 U. S. 61), held that, as a matter of construction, a residuary gift to charity was not to be reduced by the Federal estate tax which was imposed on so much of the estate as the testatrix had bequeathed to individuals. Under the State law the estate tax was payable generally out of the estate and so fell upon and reduced the residuary estate given to charity. As a legislative reversal of the decision in that case, the sentence referred to was incorporated in the revenue act of 1924 and covered Federal estate taxes as well as State inheritance taxes where, either by the terms of the will or by the local law, any such tax operated to reduce the amount given to and received by charity. In view of the retroactive repeal of the sentence, the Treasury took the position that the legislative intent thereby indicated necessarily extended both to the Federal estate tax and to State inheritance taxes.

Under the existing law, most absurd results are reached. Thus, if a testator gives his residuary estate to charity and directs that the Federal estate tax and the State inheritance taxes shall be paid out of such estate, the result may be that nothing is left for charity. In such case, notwithstanding nothing is given to charity and charity receives nothing, still there must be deducted from the gross estate a wholly fictitious sum, namely, what he would have given to charity had he not directed otherwise. The result in all other cases to which the amendment will apply varies from the foregoing example in degree only.

SECTION 808. EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PAYMENT

Under the existing law the commissioner is authorized to extend the time for the payment of the estate tax reported by the executor on the return for a period not in excess of five years from the due date. Under the bill the commissioner is given authority to extend the time for payment of such tax for a period not in excess of eight years from the due date. In the case of a deficiency in estate tax, the commissioner may extend the time for payment for a period not to exceed two years under existing law. This period is changed under the bill from two to four years. The running of the statute of limitations on assessment and collection is suspended for the period of the extension in the case of both the tax reported by the executor and the deficiency.

SECTION 809. LIEN FOR TAXES

This provision reenacts the second sentence of section 315 (a) of the revenue act of 1926, which was repealed by section 613 (b) of the revenue act of 1928, and restores to the commissioner authority for the release of the lien imposed by section 315 (a). Under existing law there is no authority for the release of a tax lien until an assessment has been made. As applied to the estate tax, this limitation has been found to be too onerous. Oftentimes estates require a partial release of lien shortly after the decedent's death and before a return can be prepared or filed, and, if the release must await an assessment, the resulting loss and inconvenience to the estate is manifest.

SECTION 810. REFUNDS

The purpose of this amendment is to remove all question as to the precise effect of a period of limitation on refunds which runs from the payment of the tax. However, contentions in favor of a contrary effect are left open for determination by the courts in cases where refund claims were filed prior to the enactment of the amendments.

SECTION 811 OF HOUSE BILL—REVALUATION OF DEPRECIATED ESTATES

The House bill contains a provision granting relief retroactively to estates whose assets greatly decreased in value subsequent to their valuation for estate-tax purposes as of the date of death. Under this provision the executor of a decedent who died on or after September 1, 1928, and prior to January 1, 1932, may elect to have the estate valued for estate-tax purposes as of a date 18 months subsequent to the date of death. In such cases, it is provided that the amount to be paid as the tax shall be an amount which bears the same ratio to a tax computed without reference to the provision as the value 18 months after death bears to the value at the date of death, but in no event is this amount to be less than 60 per cent of a tax computed without reference to the provision. Your committee has stricken this provision from the bill. It develops that it will seriously affect not only Federal revenue but also State revenues.

While the loss in revenue to the Federal Government is considerable, such loss is inconsequential as compared with the loss which the States will be forced to bear if this provision is enacted into law. This is due to the fact that many States have enacted legislation taking advantage of the 80 per cent credit provision of the revenue act of 1926. In such cases, 80 per cent of the burden occasioned by such relief must be borne by the States, while the Federal Government bears only 20 per cent of such burden. Many of the States have already collected death duties based upon the valuation of property at the date of death, and the amounts collected have already been expended for public purposes. Moreover, it is contended that such a provision will compel the States in many cases to abate outstanding taxes.

SECTION 811. FUTURE INTERESTS—EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PAYMENT OF TAX

In cases where there is included in the gross estate the value of a remainder or reversion which will not come into possession until the falling-in of the precedent interest or interests, the payment of the whole amount of the tax at the time now required may occasion considerable hardship. For example, A acquired from his father's estate a remainder in certain property which is to take effect in possession upon the termination of a life estate to B, and A dies during the lifetime of B. Or, A grants to B an estate for the life of B, and dies during B's lifetime. There is included in A's gross estate, the present value of the remainder, or reversion, which passes upon his death, which, although of substantial value, may not be readily salable or readily available as security for a loan. Your committee has therefore added a provision which permits, in such a case, the postponement of payment of the part of the tax attributable to the reversionary or remainder interest or interests until six months after the termination of the precedent interest or interests in the property. The provision, of course, is limited to cases where the property included in the gross estate is the reversionary or remainder interest as such and does not extend to the case where the decedent merely creates future estates by his own testamentary act. Postponement of payment is conditioned, however, upon the giving of bond to secure the payment of the part of the tax attributable to the future estate, with interest from 18 months after the decedent's death.

Credit for such State taxes as are allowed under section 301 (c), attributable to the reversionary or remainder interest, may be allowed if such taxes are paid, and credit claimed, at any time prior to 60 days after the termination of the precedent interest or interests. The bill does not attempt to prescribe details as to the allocation of the tax, or the credit under section 301 (c), to the future estate, or as to the adjustment of the postponed amount as the result of a redetermination of the tax, as all of these matters may more appropriately be covered in the Treasury regulations. This section is also applicable in respect to the additional tax imposed by Title II of this act.

TITLE VII.—TAX ON TRANSFERS TO AVOID INCOME TAX

SECTIONS 901, 902, 903, AND 904. TAX ON TRANSFERS TO AVOID INCOME TAX

The House bill imposes an excise tax upon the transfer of stock or securities by a citizen or resident of the United States or by a domestic corporation to a foreign corporation as paid-in surplus or to a foreign trust. The tax is to be measured by the excess of the value of the stock or securities transferred over the adjusted basis thereof as determined under section 113. Your committee concurs in the need for this tax to prevent avoidance of tax by transferring stock or securities appreciated in value to foreign corporations or foreign trusts prior to the sale thereof, but has concluded that the scope of the section should be enlarged in order the more effectually to accomplish its purpose.

Section 901 has therefore been enlarged to include not only transfers by a citizen or resident of the United States or by a domestic corporation but also transfers by a partnership or by a domestic trust (in contrast to a "foreign trust" as defined in section 903) and, furthermore, to include transfers to foreign trusts, foreign partnerships, and foreign corporations whether made as contributions to surplus or to capital. Section 902, which relieved certain transfers from the tax, has been restricted by the elimination of the portion of the House bill which exempts transfers for adequate and full consideration in money or money's worth. In this connection your committee believes that the bill should not either expressly or by implication permit the argument that an increment in value of shares or of a beneficial interest resulting from a transfer of stocks or securities should be considered full consideration in money or money's worth, and that the presence of a valuable and adequate consideration in a transaction should simply constitute one of the elements of the transaction on which the commissioner should base his conclusion as to whether one of the principal purposes of the plan is to avoid Federal income taxes. Your committee believes that the commissioner should have the widest latitude for the exercise of a sound discretion in the application of this title, both before and after the transfers are carried out.

The definition of a "foreign trust" contained in section 903 of the House bill has been slightly changed. Under the amended definition a trust is classified as "foreign" if the profit from the assumed sale of the transferred property would not be included in the gross income of the trust, the classification not being made dependent upon whether or not such profit would be taxable to the trust. This change removes any doubt concerning trusts the income of which is currently distributable and, therefore, never taxed to the trust under the income-tax title.

Section 904 has been enlarged to give the commissioner power, under proper regulations, to abate, remit, or refund a tax imposed, assessed, and/or collected under this title, if the commissioner is satisfied that the transfer was not made in pursuance of a plan having as one of its principal purposes the avoidance of Federal income taxes; this provision is likewise designed to afford the commissioner a wide latitude in his examination of the transaction as carried out and his determination in respect thereof. Otherwise, the new draft of this section follows the House bill in prescribing that the tax becomes due and payable by the transferor at the time of the transfer and in giving the commissioner authority to prescribe regulations for its assessment and collection.

TITLE VIII.—ADMINISTRATIVE AND GENERAL PROVISIONS

SECTION 1101. REVIEW OF DECISIONS OF THE BOARD OF TAX APPEALS

Section 1001 (a) of the revenue act of 1926 has been amended to reduce the period within which a petition for review of decisions of the Board of Tax Appeals may be filed from six months to three months after the decision of the board is rendered. This action brings the rule governing the period within which a petition for review of Board of Tax Appeals decisions may be filed into harmony with the rule governing the time in which a petition for review of decisions of district courts of the United States may be filed; such period was reduced from six to three months some years ago, and your committee sees no reason why a longer period should be allowed in board cases than in court cases. It is believed that this change would expedite the final closing of cases and will result in considerable saving of interest both to the Government and to the taxpayer. The rule is made to apply only in the case of decisions rendered after the passage of the act.

SECTION 1102. BOARD OF TAX APPEALS—FEES

Under existing law the board is authorized to fix a fee for preparing and comparing a transcript of the record, but no authority is given the board to fix a fee for furnishing certified copies of other miscellaneous documents. It has become an almost daily practice for taxpayers or their attorneys to call upon the board for certified copies of miscellaneous documents. The proposed bill remedies this situation by giving the board authority to fix a fee for copying any record, entry, or other paper, and the comparison and certification thereof.

SECTION 1103. LIMITATION ON SUITS BY TAXPAYERS

Section 3226 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by section 1113 of the revenue act of 1926, provided generally that no suit or proceeding for the recovery of internal-revenue taxes, penalties, or sums may be brought after the expiration of five years from the date of payment of such taxes, etc., unless such suit is begun within two years after the disallowance of the part of the claim for refund or credit to which the suit relates. Under the existing law, the exact date of disallowance is sometimes difficult of ascertainment, with the consequent uncertainty in such cases as to when the statute of limitations on suits begins to run. Moreover, the use of the two periods (five years and two years) which run from the happening of different events tends to confusion. Your committee is of the opinion that the best interests of all parties concerned will be served by an amendment which makes the date of disallowance of the claim absolutely certain in every case and which specifies but one limitation period after that date. Accordingly, the bill requires the mailing of a notice of disallowance by registered mail, and the bringing of a suit or proceeding within two years from the date of such mailing. Suits or proceedings instituted before the enactment of this bill and suits or proceedings instituted after the enactment of this bill based upon claims or parts of claims which were disallowed prior to the enactment of this bill are not affected by the amendment and remain subject to the limitations provided in the existing law.

SECTION 1104. DATE OF ALLOWANCE OF REFUND OR CREDIT

Under the practice once prevailing in the Bureau of Internal Revenue the commissioner first signed a schedule of overassessments, which fixed the amount of the taxpayer's overassessment, and later, after the collector had made appropriate adjustments to the taxpayer's account in accordance with this schedule, signed a schedule of refunds and credits, which formally approved the action so taken and directed the making of any money payments due the taxpayer. In recent years the schedule of refunds and credits has been abandoned; the commissioner's final action consists in signing the schedule of overassessments, which in itself contains complete directions as to the further steps to be taken toward abating, crediting, or refunding the overassessments entered on the schedule. Some question has arisen as to whether certain court decisions, rendered upon the basis of the previous practice and holding that the allowance of the refund or credit takes place upon the signing of the second schedule, are applicable under the new practice. The provisions of this section, added by your committee, establish a rule which accords with the practice of the Treasury and permits the allowance of refunds and credits with the minimum of difficulty to the Government and the taxpayers as well. It protects the interests of small taxpayers particularly, who may not learn of any refund or credit which may properly be due them in sufficient time to file a claim and may lose the benefit thereof unless the commissioner by signing the schedule of overassessments can make the allowance within the statutory period. In order to settle any question as to the commissioner's allowance of a number of small refunds and credits in cases recently arising, your committee has made the provisions of this section retroactive to the date of the enactment of the 1928 act.

SECTION 1105. JEOPARDY ASSESSMENT

This section authorizes prompt collection of internal-revenue taxes (other than income taxes, which are provided for under existing law) when the commissioner finds that delay until the due date fixed by law would jeopardize collection. Provision is made for postponement until the due date fixed by law if the taxpayer furnishes proper security.

SECTION 1106. REFUNDS OF MISCELLANEOUS TAXES

This section amends section 3228 of the Revised Statutes so as to expressly prohibit refund of the portion of any taxes paid more than four years before the filing of the claim (or allowance of the refund, if no claim was filed).

SECTION 1107. SPECIAL DISBURSING AGENTS OF THE TREASURY

This section permits internal-revenue agents in charge of divisions to act as special disbursing agents of the Treasury for the payment of all salaries and expenses of such divisions upon the giving of sufficient bond. The Treasury for some time has had a revenue agent designated as disbursing officer to pay the salaries of employees. The Comptroller General has raised some question as to whether this was authorized under the law contending that a collector is the only one authorized to act as disbursing officer. This amendment is made to remove any question as to the right of revenue agents to act as disbursing officers of the Treasury.

SECTION 1108. REFUND OF TAXES FOR TAXABLE YEAR 1918

Prior to the revenue act of 1924, claims for refund were required to be filed within five years from the time the return was due. Under the revenue act of 1924 and subsequent acts, the time for filing refund claims was changed, the period being reckoned from the date of payment of the tax instead of the due date of the return. In making this change from the 1921 act, the 1924 act included a saving clause permitting claims for refund for the years 1919 and 1920 to be filed within five years from the time the return was due. The year 1918 was inadvertently omitted from the saving clause, presumably on the theory that the 5-year period in such a case had expired prior to the enactment of the 1924 act. This assumption has been found to have been in error. The provisions of the revenue act of 1924 were incorporated into the revenue act of 1926. Your committee corrects this error by inserting in the saving clause of section 284 (h) of the revenue act of 1926, the year 1918.

SECTION 1109. JOINT VENTURES, SYNDICATES, POOLS, AND OTHER SIMILAR ORGANIZATIONS

Some confusion has existed over the requirements of the prior acts as to the time and manner of returning income from the operations of joint ventures, syndicates, pools, and similar organizations. If the syndicate was not an association, partnership, or trust within the meaning of the act there was no express requirement in the act or regulations for the filing of a syndicate return, and the sole responsibility of making returns of the annual gains and losses of the syndicate was placed upon the several members. Quite frequently, however, the members of such a syndicate overlooked the necessity of their making returns each year of their shares in the annual gains and losses from syndicate operations and assumed that they were required only to make returns of their shares in the ultimate gain or loss from the entire syndicate operations in the year when the syndicate was wound up or liquidated. Moreover, a strict observance of the letter of the prior acts would have required each member to determine his annual share in the syndicate gains or losses upon the basis of his own accounting period and according to his own method of accounting, irrespective of the accounting period or method of accounting upon which the books or records of the syndicate were kept.

The bill does away with this uncertainty by placing all joint ventures, syndicates, pools, and similar organizations which do not constitute associations or trusts in the category of partnerships, and the members of such syndicates, pools, etc., in the category of partners. This provision will have the effect of requiring the syndicate to file a partnership return and will thus make it easier for the members to determine the distributive shares in the syndicate gains and losses which are to be included in their own returns.

[Senate Report 665, part 2, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Finance, submitted the following minority views (to accompany H. R. 10236):

We emphatically dissent from the inclusion in the revenue bill as reported by the Finance Committee of the tariff duties on oil, coal, copper, and lumber, masquerading as excise taxes. We regard the inclusion of these tariffs in the present bill, under all the circumstances, as utterly indefensible. We believe that it is unsound in principle and dangerous in practice to attempt to make the present revision of our domestic tax laws the vehicle for tariff tinkering. Furthermore, the prospective revenue yield of these proposed tariff taxes is negligible.

More important is the fact that these tariffs, at best, will be of doubtful benefit to domestic producers, may adversely affect domestic consumers, and will work most certain injury to our foreign trade and our foreign relations. The probable ultimate consequences of this further attempted tampering with a desperately sick economic situation throughout the world may well occasion the gravest apprehension.

No argument has been advanced in favor of the present tariff proposals on oil, coal, copper, and lumber that was not presented to and rejected by the Congress in the framing of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930, other than the fact that these industries are in a more depressed state now than then, and their necessities for relief more urgent now than at that time. The same may be said for every other industry in the country, and if the distress of American industry is to be the excuse and justification of new tariff levies, of increased tariff rates, and of embargoes, then why stop with oil, coal, copper, and lumber; why single them out for special tariff favor?

An outstanding factor in regard to all of the industries which would be protected by these new tariffs is the point that each has been primarily an export industry and continues to export a substantially larger value of products annually than it imports. Thus, even in the depression year of 1931, the net balance of exports over imports for the items for which duties have been proposed was as follows: Petroleum and products, $177,758,000; coal, $54,984,000; lumber, rough and planed, $29,830,000; copper, $6,003,000; coke, $3,494,000.

In other words, it is proposed to risk the loss of an export trade which amounted even in a very poor year to $440,000,000—18½ per cent of our entire foreign business—for the sake of eliminating an import business valued at $175,000,000. It is elimination or embargo of imports that is the real objective of the proponents of these tariffs, and if the proposed duties were successful in raising domestic prices they would most certainly make it impossible for the American products affected to compete with the excluded imports in world markets and would decrease to that extent at least the volume of our export trade.

However, the results of these new tariffs upon American foreign trade would not be confined to the items immediately affected. Canada, which furnishes us with lumber and copper, Venezuela, Colombia, and Mexico, which supply us with petroleum, and Chile and Peru, which send us copper, would all be seriously irritated by these embargoes against their trade and would most certainly retaliate with countermeasures to exclude exports of American manufactures.

A further important consideration is the fact that the proposed tariffs on copper involves a readjustment upward of a host of other tariff rates. Every article of import in which copper has a part is to take an equivalent compensatory duty. Thus with the stroke of a pen it is proposed to alter the cost and the price of hundreds of articles in common use. The resulting upset and confusion in trade and commerce is self-evident.

In the final analysis, therefore, the tariff items in the revenue bill will raise little, if any, revenue, will seriously disrupt our foreign trade; no benefit will accrue to the domestic industries involved unless they result in increased prices in the home market; and if increased prices do result, to that extent a new burden is laid upon the already impoverished and overtaxed consumer.

OIL

With respect to the proposed duties on petroleum products it is to be noted that the total domestic production of crude petroleum in 1931 amounted to 850,261,000 barrels; total imports of crude and refined petroleum products amounted to 86,082,000 barrels; total exports of crude and refined petroleum products and bunker fuel oil amounted to 168,229,000 barrels. Our exports were twice our imports and our imports about 10 per cent of our domestic production.

Witnesses before the committee for and against these oil-tariff proposals were in hopeless disagreement as to almost every essential phase of the controvery. The proponents contended that these tariffs would yield large revenues to the Government because they would not operate as an embargo on imported oil and gasoline. They claimed the imports would come in just the same; that the tariff of 2½ cents per gallon would be without effect on the price of gasoline in the American market; that the rate of 1 cent per gallon on crude and fuel oil as carried in the House bill (the Senate bill as reported carries a rate of one-half cent per gallon) was insufficient to measure the difference in cost of production here and abroad. They further stated the tariff would not substantially increase prices of crude and fuel oil in the home market, hence would be no burden upon the consumer and yet that these tariffs would be a priceless boon to the hard-pressed and depressed domestic oil industry.

The opponents contended that the tariffs would act as an embargo, would yield no revenue, would raise the price of fuel oil and gasoline to the American public by the full amount of the tariff and more, would operate as a tax upon our own citizens of hundreds of millions of dollars annually and all for the enrichment of a group of major oil companies who own 97 per cent of the 623,000,000 barrels of oil in storage, this stored oil comprising 70 per cent of one year's supply.

On the question of revenue yield Secretary of the Treasury Mills replied to a question as to whether a tariff of 1 cent on crude and fuel oil and 2 cents on imported gasoline would produce any revenue as follows:

"In the opinion of the experts of the Department of Commerce such a tax would yield no revenue, since the levy which would be added to the import price exceeds the margin of advantage on which oil is imported to this country and would therefore exclude the products affected."

On the question of the effect of the tariff on the price of oil and gasoline to the American public, since the domestic production of gasoline is so far in excess of domestic requirements and the import of gasoline so relatively trivial (13,621,000 barrels of gasoline were imported in 1931 as compared with a domestic consumption of gasoline of 16,712,000,000 gallons, or 397,905,000 barrels), the extent to which a tariff on gasoline will increase the price to the domestic consumer is perhaps debatable. But with respect to the proposed tariff on crude and fuel oil there can be no doubt that it must either operate to raise the price of crude and fuel oil in the United States or else be of no benefit whatever to the oil industry. The conclusion is inescapable that the imposition of this oil tariff will mean a levy of many millions of dollars annually upon the industries and individuals who are users of fuel oil without any accruing revenue to the Treasury. If this duty becomes effective, the consumers will pay $73,212,000 annually in increased prices for fuel oil.

COAL

The proposed duty on coal and coke as carried in the present bill, in our judgment, is utterly preposterous. According to Department of Commerce figures we exported 13,088,259 tons of coal and coke in 1931 and imported only 836,769 tons, a ratio of 16 to 1 in favor of our exports. The total production of coal and coke in the United States in 1931 was 459,716,104 tons, so that our imports of 836,769 tons represent less than one-fifth of 1 per cent of our total coal and coke production. It is to eliminate this almost infinitesimal amount of imported coal, which does not undersell domestic coal but in fact commands a higher price than the domestic product, that this tariff duty of 10 cents per 100 pounds, $2 per short ton, is in the bill. It will raise no revenue whatever. By the exclusion of the imported coal it will enlarge the potential domestic market by one-fifth of 1 per cent. The proponents of this tariff have but one objective. They hope to displace 600,000 tons of imported anthracite coal now sold in New England with an equal amount of Pennsylvania anthracite.

COPPER

There is no gainsaying the present distress of the American copper industry in the United States. Copper is now selling in New York at around 6 cents per pound. This compares with an average price for the past 30 years (excluding the war years) of 14.8 cents. American copper mines are said to have a potential capacity of 1,318,000 short tons per annum. In 1931 the United States market absorbed roundly 454,500 tons of primary copper and present consumption is lower still, perhaps not in excess of 25 per cent of our producing capacity. Present stocks of copper above ground are said to represent one year's supply for the entire world at present rate of consumption, and the United States alone owns 71 per cent of this stock. Foreign production of copper far outruns foreign consumption. The surplus of foreign copper is displacing domestic copper in our domestic market. What is true of many other commodities applies to copper. The world is suffering from a huge surplus of copper.

The question at issue is whether the erection of a tariff wall against foreign copper will in the long run benefit the country. On that question testimony of opposing copper groups before the Finance Committee was in sharp disagreement.

The proponents of a copper tariff sought a rate of 5 cents per pound, and said that they anticipated its effect would be to stabilize the price of American copper in the American market at around 11 cents per pound.

The bill as reported carries a copper tariff at the rate of 4 cents per pound. The contention that despite such a duty foreign copper will still be dumped in this market and pay a duty, and hence the Government will derive a tariff revenue from the copper duty is in our judgment unconvincing. We incline to the view that the proposed duty would exclude foreign copper, and hence be of no consequence so far as revenue is concerned. On the question of the benefit of the proposed duty to the American copper industry and to the country we are inclined to subscribe to the views presented by those representatives of the industry who oppose the duty and who contend that it will do more harm than good. In any event we submit that the present revenue bill is not the time and place for Congress to deal with the complicated and world-embracing issues which are raised by the question of removing copper from the free list, where it has remained since 1894, and granting compensatory duties to the large number of manufactured products that contain copper.

LUMBER

The petitions for a tariff duty on lumber come from the lumber operators of Oregon and Washington.

No new argument has been advanced for increasing the protective tariff duty on lumber that was not considered by the Congress prior to the passage of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of June 17, 1930. Evidence of course was presented of the present depressed state of the lumber industry. The financial difficulties of operators, unemployment, want, and suffering were stressed. No conditions surrounding this industry were presented that are not applicable at the present time to practically every other industry in the United States. Furthermore, the conditions described in the lumber industry and in the communities where lumber operations are carried on are similar to conditions existing in the lumber communities of Canada. It is even claimed that there has been a higher percentage of failures in this industry in Canada than in this country.

One-half of the lumber (lumber planed or dressed on more than one side) included within this proposal is now subject to a protective duty of $1 per thousand feet. The United States Tariff Commission was importuned, under the flexible provisions of the tariff law, to increase this duty. As late as November 9, 1931, the Tariff Commission reported that a change in the duty of $1 per thousand feet was not warranted. On December 2, 1931, the President approved of this finding.

Advocates of this tariff therefore propose to override the findings of the Tariff Commission and the President, after an exhaustive study into the difference in the cost of production, including transportation, of Canadian lumber with the like American product. Yet the Finance Committee incorporated the rate of $3 per thousand feet in addition to the present rate of $1 per thousand feet already found to be adequate by the Tariff Commission and the President.

Rough lumber, now on the free list, is to be given a duty of $3 per 1,000 feet. If the Tariff Commission found no justification for increasing the tariff duty on dressed lumber above the present rate of $1, there can be no sound argument in favor of rough lumber being given a duty of $3 per 1,000 feet, especially when it is admitted that there is an element of labor that enters into the cost of dressed lumber as compared with rough lumber. The Tariff Commission found that the difference in total cost of producing rough lumber in Canada and America was 11 cents per 1,000 feet.

The result of an indiscriminate imposition of a tariff tax of $3 per 1,000 feet board measure on many dissimilar items of lumber will cause endless confusion and inequalities to various industries and consumers. This duty, in the absence of a definition of the classes of lumber included, would embrace inexpensive and expensive classes of lumber, for it includes all hardwoods, such as mahogany, lignum vitæ, maple, and birch; also, all softwoods used in the building of homes and in the manufacture of boxes, crates, containers, cigar boxes, and the like.

The industries affected that might properly claim compensatory duties if the increased duty stands are manufacturers of agricultural implements, hardware, fixtures, caskets, refrigerators, trunks, picture frames, tobacco boxes, toys, pencils, and penholders, brushes, artificial limbs, airplanes, pattern making, etc.

The fact that no distinction is made in the duty on lumber on the type used by the farmer and the home builder and lumber used on more extensive construction and industrial projects would result in this duty being equivalent to 33⅓ per cent ad valorem on cheap lumber costing $12 per thousand, and a duty of less than 1 per cent ad valorem on expensive lumber selling at $250 and more per thousand feet (for instance, as used in airplanes and for mahogany paneling in high-priced office buildings and residences).

The burden of the proposed tax would fall upon the consumers of every article of lumber used in the United States. The domestic producers who seek this duty for the purpose of increasing their prices will expect to get the benefit of the duty to the fullest extent possible under the law. Eliminating the effect of pyramiding, the rate of $3 per thousand feet increase of the present duty, based upon an average consumption of about 35,000,000,000 feet, will result in a total cost to consumers in the United States of about $105,000,000 annually.

From the standpoint of producing revenue the rate is destructive, for it will result in being an absolute embargo. An embargo will be detrimental to the producers as well as to the domestic consumers. Naturally the lumber producers in Canada who will be forced out of the American market will send their lumber elsewhere, causing competition with American exporters of lumber exported to Cuba, South America, China, Japan, and other markets.

The exports of lumber have an annual average of 100 per cent in excess of imports. What the advocates of this duty are seeking is the impossible. They would prevent all countries from selling us goods and, at the same time, expect them to buy from us.

The admission of foreign lumber produced through indentured or forced labor is prevented by existing law. If this law is being improperly enforced, the responsibility is with the executive department. If the law is not effective in preventing the very limited amount of lumber imported from countries suspected of using this class of labor (less than 14,000,000 feet), we favor the enactment of more drastic provisions to control such imports.

CONCLUSIONS

The logrolling methods which have resulted in the incorporation of these particular tariff items, for these items yield no income to the Government worth considering, would be indefensible even if the committee were considering a general revision of the tariff; but to resort to the trades, exchange of votes, and on-again off-again performances that characterize the incorporation of these items in an emergency revenue measure is an exhibition that will raise serious questions in the public mind concerning the capacity of representative government to function promptly and without self-interest in a great emergency. Perhaps the least said about the performance the better. We doubt if even the "victors" are particularly proud of their handiwork.

In brief, these tariff items are riders to a bill whose sole purpose should be to balance the Budget and would not be seriously considered by the Congress if proposed in a bill of their own because there are no cogent arguments for their imposition. We urge that these "logrolled" tariffs in a bill seeking to balance the Budget deficiency be rejected by the Senate, as they have already been repudiated and condemned by the public sentiment of the country, regardless of party or personal views concerning the protective principle.

PAT HARRISON.
WALTER F. GEORGE.
DAVID I. WALSH.
EDWARD P. COSTIGAN.
CORDELL HULL.

In the absence of an opportunity to read and check all of the foregoing minority views, I concur in the dissent of the minority for the reasons well stated in the opening paragraph.

EDWARD P. COSTIGAN.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the Senator said he thought the committee had done a pretty good job, but I want to draw the Senator's attention to the fact that this bill is not the committee's bill. This is Mr. Mills's bill. I desire to read a telegram I received to-day from Detroit. It is as follows:

Is Congress or Secretary Mills enacting the revenue legislation? A statement published here attributed to Mills says that latter told representatives of automobile industry, even before the bill reached floor of Senate, that there was no hope of escaping the special tax levies, and that the industry might as well resign itself to carry the additional burden. Since when has Congress become a rubber stamp for Mills? Why are Mills and his predecessors so antagonistic toward the industry that led the way to prosperity in 1921, and is making an epic fight vastly greater than any other industry to repeat? What is the real motive behind this unfair, vicious, discriminatory, punitive taxation being forced upon a bewildered Congress by a high officer of a Republican administration against America's most courageous industrialists and the chief industry of the most Republican State, namely, Michigan?

I want to say to the Senator that the antagonism of the Secretary of the Treasury and his predecessor is due to the fact that it is the only major industry in the United States that they have not been able to control. The great financiers of New York and Wall Street—and as I refer to Wall Street I am looking right into the face of my friend, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]—know it is the only major industry that they have not been able to control. They have controlled the railroad business. We know the history of the railroad business. We know what the history of the automobile business would have been had the great New York financiers been able to control and do with it what they have done with the railroads and other great business enterprises.

I wanted to make that statement now because the Senator from Utah referred to the bill as a "committee bill" while as a matter of fact it is Mr. Mills's bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is not a single solitary tax imposed in the bill against which there has not been vehement protest—not a single tax of any kind. As to some of them, I have received thousands of telegrams and more than thousands of letters. If we had paid any attention to them, we would not have a tax on a single item.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator produce the evidence of protests that he has received against an increase in corporation taxes? Will the Senator produce the evidence of protests that he has received against the 1918 income-tax rate? I submit the Senator has not had any voluminous protests against those equitable taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. Whether the Senator insists or not——

Mr. COUZENS. I merely ask the Senator to produce the evidence.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not a tax in the bill against which there has not been a protest.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to his colleague?

Mr. COUZENS. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Before the Senator takes his seat he may be interested in being reminded that when Mr. Mills testified on October 31, 1927, respecting automobile taxes, he urged as one of the principal reasons for taxing automobiles that the railroads needed the assistance through that indirect method.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator knows the New York financial interests, and Mr. Mills and his predecessors, controlled and operated and dominated the railroads, and of course they are antagonistic to every industry which in any way affects their welfare. That is the reason why for years and years the Treasury Department, no matter by whom officered, has been antagonistic to the motor industry.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, just at the time this new burden of $1,000,000,000 in taxes is about to be placed upon the American people, whose tax backs are already very badly bent if not broken, I rise once more to ask if at the next convention of the Republican Party a referendum plank on the liquor question is to be adopted, because I want to point out in all seriousness that if we can deal with a tax upon beer at this time, one-half of this $1,000,000,000 burden can be eliminated.

Further than that, to take issue with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], it is the only tax against which the American people will not protest. I stand here individually protesting against taxing the people of my State and the other States of the Union $600,000,000 when racketeers and bootleggers are waxing rich and contributing nothing whatsoever to the Government while honest industry is penalized.

What we are doing in this bill is taxing honest work and putting crime on the free list. With 10,000,000 men walking the streets begging for jobs, with our community funds breaking down, with business frightened almost to death, I say it is an outrage that this huge burden of $1,000,000,000 a year is to be put on the people at this time. When men are afraid of what the next month will bring forth, we sit here and do not tax the one thing that will make half of this burden unnecessary.

I ask now who is right—Secretary of War Hurley and Assistant Secretary of the Navy Jahncke, who have gone about the country saying the President will favor some modification at the Chicago convention, on the one hand, or the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], the chairman of the Republican National Committee, on the other hand, who says the President will not do that? Can anyone answer? In a period of emergency, in a period of fright, in a period of unemployment, in a period when we are threatened with $1,000,000,000 of new taxes, no one in the Republic can tell where the leader of the country stands on an issue upon which every person in the country has some sort of an opinion.

We are told that after we adjourn and after we sandbag every honest business in the country with this huge burden of taxation, after we have left here and it is too late for Congress to act, the President is going to take a position upon the liquor question. I would not object at all to his saying that he believes more prohibition would be a good thing for the country or that he thinks it has had a trial and has been a failure; but I submit that he ought to have some opinion on it in the face of a $1,000,000,000 tax bill about which the people are already very much frightened.

There would not be any need for these automobile taxes, there would not be any need for these admission taxes, there would not be any need for most of these excise taxes if we would tax the thing which Al Capone taxed, but which we can not tax; but we go into the back door of Mr. Capone's home and take his ill-gotten gains, after we have had a trial in a court of law, and are ready to share in his illegal profits by taking it in the form of an income tax.

Tell me about leadership and courage and tell the people of the Nation that Congress refuses to function and act! Let us cast our eyes down Pennsylvania Avenue and ask the man who has received the confidence of the people of the country by an overwhelming majority to say whether he favors, for example, the proposition offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], whereby honest industry can be saved $500,000,000 of new taxes, and whether we can use that sum to finance the construction program and use it to pay the interest and the sinking fund on the bonds and put to work the 10,000,000 honest people who are now out of work and asking for jobs and a chance to regain their self-respect and provide for themselves and their families.

There is where we need leadership, but no one in the Republic knows where the leader stands. We go into battle. The field of battle is here. The issue is $1,000,000,000 of new taxes, and our leader will not tell us whether we should make a frontal attack on the bill, a flank attack, or an attack from the rear. If from the White House there should come down here a message that the President recommends at least raising the limit of one-half of 1 per cent to the point where it would not interfere with either the philosophy or the letter or the spirit of the eighteenth amendment, namely, to 2.75 per cent of alcoholic content by volume, we could adopt that suggestion and we could put it in this bill. We could tax that product and thus we would make unnecessary a lot of the taxes now proposed in the bill. But do we get any suggestion of that kind?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Let us go ahead and have a program of our own.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am ready to go ahead and have my program, and I want to get it adopted. If I can get the support of the leaders of the country, I can get it adopted and save the honest people of the country from having to pay $500,000,000 in taxes.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, has the Senator conferred with Mr. Mills, Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I am not on such high financial grounds in these times.

Mr. COUZENS. I suggest to the Senator that he confer with him, because I think probably he could get his program O. K'd there. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I will say in answer to the Senator from Michigan that I do not know how true it is, but by way of the "grapevine" I have learned that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, has been urging upon the President for some time, in this period of dire national emergency, the great need of a change in our prohibition law, to which the President has turned a deaf ear. Even the President's silence would be understandable, may I say to the Senator from Michigan, were it not for the fact that others in his official family, members of the Cabinet, are going about the country and—to audiences, of course, favorable to a change in the prohibition law and in order to curry presidential favor—are saying that the President is going to favor a referendum in the Republican convention after Congress shall have adjourned; and then, on the other hand, another man in the official family, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], says, "No; that is not true." So we have the wets thinking the President is all right and the drys thinking the President is all right, while a billion dollars of new taxes are about to fall on the backs of the already overburdened taxpayers of the Nation.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. Has the Senator from Maryland got the Democratic leader with him on that matter?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have enough to do if I can get the one man to utter a statement which will permit the adoption of this program.

Mr. COUZENS. But the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] suggested a program for the relief of unemployment the other day which carried great weight and great strength until it got somewhat emasculated at the White House. I merely wondered if the Senator's program for a beer proposal would get as far as the program for relief of unemployment?

Mr. TYDINGS. I can answer that question very satisfactorily by telling the Senator from Michigan that the Senator from Arkansas and all the other Members of the Senate will have an opportunity to vote on that program so that their position will be discovered in the next two or three weeks. What I am afraid I will be unable to do, because this is presidential-election year, is to avoid the apparent feeling that we would rather charge the American people $500,000,000 in new taxes that a word from the right kind of leadership would make unnecessary.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I want to ask the Senator whether or not it might not be in the President's mind that the people of the United States would protest against giving up 8 to 12 per cent beer, on which they are paying no tax, and going back to 2.75 per cent beer and paying a tax? [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. There may be something to that, but my "spies" bring me word that the actual cost of a bottle of beer in the average place to-day runs from 20 to 25 cents, and even with a tax of 3 cents a pint we all know that better beer and more of it could be had for at least half that sum; so that the President's economy is not considering the plight of the beer drinker.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator is an expert on this subject, but I want to ask if he thinks those who like their beer so well would be satisfied with 2.75 to 4 per cent beer?

Mr. TYDINGS. My answer to the Senator from Florida is to try it and he will be surprised. [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must admonish occupants of the galleries that it is contrary to the rules of the Senate to have any manifestations of approval or disapproval take place in the galleries.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay this debate, and I will just make a concluding remark.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. It was no purpose of mine to break into the very wise and properly placed discourse of my eminent friend from Maryland, but it was to address myself to the Senator from Michigan who had asked the question as to whether or not Mr. Mills had approved or whether he had actually written it. I should like to remind the eminent Senator from Michigan that it is an age-old axiom that "the mills of God grind slowly but they grind exceeding fine."

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I want to make a concluding observation. We are facing next fall and winter with a very dismal picture ahead. Despite the situation, with 10,000,000 unemployed, with 700,000 farms sold within the last two years on mortgage foreclosures, and for delinquent taxes, with about 5,000 bank failures during the last 18 months, we are about to impose upon the honest people of this country a tax of $500,000,000 more than they would have to pay were we to legalize, without interference with the Constitution, the sale of 2.75 per cent beer, and yet, in the face of that emergency, the President, the leader of the people of the United States, sits silent. While two members of his Cabinet go out and say he is going to oppose any modification of the prohibition law and a member of his semiofficial cabinet says he is not going to do it, he is content to reap what have the appearance, if they are not in fact, the fruits of political expediency rather than conviction.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that we have at this time a system for the distribution and sale of whisky legally?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think so.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Does the Senator know how much whisky is dispensed legally annually at this time?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not the exact figures; but, as the Senator says, under the Volstead Act, it is possible to get whisky for medicinal purposes, and sometimes when a patient is not very sick.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that during the past year or 18 months some nine or ten distilleries were opened by the Government, and during this time that something like 2,000,000 gallons of whisky were made by such distilleries?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that the reason of that is——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator for a question, but I do not want to lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). The Senator from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Maryland will not lose the floor. I want to state to the Senator that the warehouses are filled at certain times, and then no more whisky is put in them until the supply on hand is exhausted. I do not know the quantity of liquor that is in the warehouses, controlled, of course, by the Government; but, as I have said, as soon as the supply on hand is exhausted, or nearly so, then it is replenished. Such whisky is supposed to be for medicinal purposes.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I do not desire to take the Senator from Maryland from the floor; but, in connection with his remarks, if he will permit me, I desire to ask one or two further questions.

Mr. TYDINGS. I will be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am advised that we are now selling about 2,000,000 gallons of whisky a year.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think, speaking from memory, that figure is accurate.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Two million gallons, at the rate of 8 pints per gallon, make 16,000,000 pints of whisky now being dispensed legally.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is right.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. And those pints sell, as I understand, for approximately $3 a pint?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is right.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That does not include the prescription.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; the prescription usually costs $1 or $2 extra, as I understand.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. On the sale of the 16,000,000 pints of whisky would the Senator favor a tax of, say, 10 per cent on each pint?

Mr. TYDINGS. I would be glad to do so, with this qualification: If it would be possible to differentiate between purely medicinal liquor, which is obtained by a man who is really ill, and the whisky which goes to a man who is getting it under the guise of illness simply to drink for his pleasure, I would be glad to impose a very heavy tax on it. I will say, however, frankly to the Senator that I would hesitate to do that, feeling that in many deserving cases I would penalize what was really medicine. I would not want to add to the costs incurred by people who are ill and who are using the liquor for purely medicinal purposes and in a perfectly honest and reasonable way.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. A 10 per cent tax on a pint of whisky that sells for $3 would be 30 cents; and if 16,000,000 pints were sold, a 10 per cent tax on that whisky, if such a tax were incorporated in this bill by amendment, would bring into the Treasury approximately $5,000,000. Would the Senator favor the consideration of that sort of an amendment?

Mr. TYDINGS. I would look on it with favor; but I would say that if we should go into the business of taxing whisky, it seems to me our position would be even more ludicrous than it is now if we did not tax 2.75 beer. I do not think we could very well go into the field of medicinal liquor and tax that product and then let beer altogether escape and allow Mr. Capone and his satellites to make vast sums of money out of the sale of beer.

The point I rose to emphasize was this: I am not here at this moment to talk about the merits or demerits of any wet or dry measure, but I am wondering how the leader in the White House can fail to take a definite stand when half his official family picture him as in favor of one side of the question and the remainder picture him as being on the opposite side, and that situation arises on the eve of the convention where his position will have to be disclosed; and when, if that position were favorable to that for which I contend, we would make half of these proposed taxes unnecessary. I say that, in my humble judgment, with all due respect, the President of the United States owes it to the country now, and not in the Republican convention, to say where he stands on the matter of prohibition.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Maryland and also the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to the fact that all the liquor that goes into the bonded warehouses pays a tax. We collect over $10,000,000 a year on the liquor that goes into the bonded warehouses and is withdrawn.

Mr. TYDINGS. I did not understand the Senator's statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I say that the Government collects over $10,000,000 a year on the liquor that goes into bonded warehouses. When it is withdrawn, it pays taxes to that amount.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Utah has brought out a very significant point, namely, that we are actually taxing medicine; that is what we are doing; we are taxing the medicine of the country $10,000,000 a year; but we are not taxing beer a single cent, though whisky used for medicinal purposes is yielding the Government $10,000,000 a year.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to inquire of the Senator if beer is a medicine or a food?

Mr. TYDINGS. I believe it is both. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I assume the Senator thinks that to impose a tax on 2.75 per cent beer would be within the spirit of and not violative of the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am glad the Senator asked me that question, and, categorically, I will say yes. I will make this brief explanation: Suppose, may I say to the Senator from California, that it were proposed by some bill now in Congress to raise the alcoholic content from one-half of 1 per cent to five-eighths of 1 per cent—a mere one-eighth of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume. No one would get frightened at that; everybody would still contend that that amount of alcohol was not intoxicating, because there would be 199 parts of water for every part of alcohol.

If it could be raised, one-eighth per cent, there must be some point above one-half of 1 per cent where there would be reached the line above which the product would be actually intoxicating and below which it would be nonintoxicating. The amendment which I offered here, and which we will vote upon I hope in the near future in connection with the construction program, which it is proposed to finance by a tax on beer, sought to put the amount at such a point that every honest and sincere "dry," and moreover every honest and sincere lover of and believer in the Constitution could vote for it without going back on his principles or on his Government.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Manifestly we have all taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and the question which we must decide is whether voting for an increased percentage, would or would not be violative of that Constitution. I understand the Senator's position to be, as a thoughtful lawyer, that to legalize and to tax beer, for example, of 2.75 per cent alcoholic content would not be in violation of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is my belief.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. For, of course, so long as the eighteenth amendment remains as a part of the Constitution it must be recognized, respected, and upheld. That is the position of the Senator, as I understand it?

Mr. TYDINGS. Substantially; but I would not want to say that I myself believe that a slightly higher percentage than that would not be legal. I have, however, tried to fix the alcoholic content at the highest point where I felt a reasonable and honest Senator, mindful of the Constitution, would want to go, although there may be others who feel that the limit is above or, conversely, below that point.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Bearing in mind the language of the amendment which prohibits the manufacture, sale, transportation, and so forth of——

Mr. TYDINGS. Intoxicating liquors.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes—bearing that in mind, of course, we can not, under our oaths, violate that provision.

Mr. TYDINGS. If I may inject right there, let me say to the Senator that this point has never been brought to the attention of the Supreme Court; at least it has never been passed on. The eighteenth amendment provides that the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, and exportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes shall be prohibited. It uses specifically the word "liquor"; it does not say "beer, wine, and liquor." If the Senator will read, as he possibly has, and as I have had occasion to read lately, some of the cases which have gone to our inferior Federal courts and to our Supreme Court, he will know that we imposed in the old days three kinds of taxes: A tax on beer, a tax on wine, and a tax on liquor. So Congress over and over again considered that wine and beer were not under the head of liquor, and the courts in determining the amount of taxation to be levied have made the same distinction.

There are many people—and I am one of them—who, aside from the merits or demerits of the so-called "wet" and "dry" question, as a legal proposition believe that the word "liquor" never included wine or beer. I should like to see that question tested. If the constitutional amendment had said "all alcoholic drinks for beverage purposes, which are intoxicating," then, of course, we would have included the whole gamut of alcoholic drinks, but the constitutional amendment merely says "liquor." So, in my judgment, we could legalize 4 per cent beer or 5 per cent beer without violating the letter, at least, of the eighteenth amendment and, I believe, without violating its spirit.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Assuming, however, that under the term "liquor," beer and wines are included, is it or is it not the opinion of the Senator that the constitutional power to fix the limit rests with Congress?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And that if Congress should exercise its power to fix a percentage, the courts would respect and uphold the action of Congress?

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly; if, by any reasonable conception of the amount fixed, Congress had not abused what obviously is a discretionary power.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It unquestionably has the discretionary power to fix the percentage.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think it has; and I believe the Supreme Court would go far out of its way to agree that any mandate of the Congress so passed did not conflict with the eighteenth amendment unless upon its very face it were so unreasonable that it could not be otherwise construed.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Finally, does the Senator think that the people should have the right, as a constitutional right, to repeal or modify or amend the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. TYDINGS. Should they have the right?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. To be pursued, I take it, under the provisions prescribed and provided in Article V of the Constitution?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes, sir; I agree with that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the first amendment of the committee, on page 8, line 2.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, has the Senator from Utah asked unanimous consent to consider committee amendments first?

Mr. SMOOT. I have.

Mr. McNARY. When was that consent given?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that that is not contained in the words of the request.

Mr. SMOOT. That was intended to be my request in the beginning, Mr. President.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I shall not oppose the request; but I do not think it was asked, or an order for it made. If it is now about to be asked, I shall suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Couzens	Keyes	Shipstead
Bailey	Dale	King	Shortridge
Bankhead	Dill	La Follette	Smith
Barbour	Fletcher	Lewis	Smoot
Barkley	Frazier	Logan	Steiwer
Bingham	Glass	Long	Stephens
Blaine	Glenn	McGill	Townsend
Bulkley	Hale	McKellar	Trammell
Bulow	Harrison	McNary	Tydings
Byrnes	Hatfield	Metcalf	Vandenberg
Capper	Hayden	Norris	Wagner
Caraway	Howell	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Carey	Hull	Patterson	Walsh, Mont.
Connally	Johnson	Reed	Watson
Coolidge	Jones	Robinson, Ark.	Wheeler
Copeland	Kean	Robinson, Ind.
Costigan	Kendrick	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The bill will be read for amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, has unanimous consent been granted yet to take up committee amendments first?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President. Unanimous consent was given to proceed with the consideration of the bill and to dispense with its formal reading.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to make this observation before we proceed:

The tariff questions involved in this bill are perhaps going to precipitate quite a long discussion. I hope not; but can we not get unanimous consent that the tariff questions shall be the last items considered in this bill, so that we may get through with the constructive features of the tax bill before we get on to the tariff questions? I am sure it would expedite matters. It might obviate our getting into some coalitions, and it seems to me it might work to the general welfare of all.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that in the consideration of this bill the tariff items be considered as the last items in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not think the Senator should propound that request at this particular time without consulting a number of Senators who are concerned in what the Senator calls tariff items.

This is a tax bill; and the presumption is that the Finance Committee has put items in the bill to raise taxes. Therefore, I ask the Senator to withhold his request until such time as other Senators who are interested may be consulted.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course I will withhold it; and I shall not insist on it if it does not meet the wishes of the Senate. There are at least four items in the bill that are considered tariff items, aside from the question of raising revenue; and it seems to me those four items ought to be taken up last. If, however, there is any objection, of course I shall not insist on it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. While the Senator is considering that particular matter, would he consider taking what he terms the four tariff items first in order, rather than last?

Mr. HARRISON. I think it would be better for them to come up last. That is my idea about it; but, of course, those who favor the tariff items may think they ought to come up first. I shall not insist on my request, but I am sure what I have proposed would expedite the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I should like them to come up last.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think we had better proceed with the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, under ordinary procedure with legislation in the Senate it is customary to read a bill for action on the committee amendments first. In connection with the tariff bill, however, we had an understanding that as each title came up we would determine whether we would proceed with the committee amendments first or whether the House text, even though not amended by the committee, might be the subject of amendment.

In connection with the consideration of this legislation, in my judgment, it is quite important that we should have unanimous consent that in so far as Title I, Title II, and Title III are concerned, while those titles are under consideration it shall be in order for any Senator to offer an amendment not only to the committee amendments but also to unamended portions of the House text.

I will explain briefly why I think that is important.

Take the income-tax schedule, for instance. The committee has not amended the House text. It has merely added certain brackets in the higher incomes. If we followed the usual procedure, any Senator desiring to offer a different schedule could only offer an amendment to a committee amendment. He could not offer an amendment to amend the House text unamended by the committee. Obviously, orderly procedure would indicate that all of the income-tax brackets should be open to amendment at the same time.

For instance, in the committee the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] offered the 1918 income-tax rates. That changes the rates in all the brackets, not just those affected by the committee amendments. I have discussed the matter with the Senator from Utah, and I am sure he is agreeable to the suggestion. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that in so far as Title I, which is the income tax; Title II, the additional estate tax; and Title III, the gift tax, are concerned, it shall be in order to offer amendments not only to committee amendments but to unamended portions of the House text.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I inquire why the Senator stops short of Title IV, in which the automobile tax certainly should be considered as a whole in the same way?

Mr. SMOOT. All the other titles would be in exactly the same situation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Why should three titles be picked out? Why not proceed under a general rule such as the Senator describes?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. I think there is force in what is said by the Senator from Wisconsin with regard to the rates, and it seems to me that it is only fair that the agreement should apply to all other rates stated in the bill. But we should not make the agreement in the broad language suggested by the Senator, because I understand that his thought is directed only on the schedules of rates, and if we should make the agreement in the broad language there would be no good in reading the bill for committee amendments at all, because all of the plain text of the bill would come within the scope of the Senator's suggestion. I suggest, therefore, that the Senator change his request to make it apply to all schedules of rates in the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the only difficulty with that is this, if I may say so to the Senator from Pennsylvania. The Senator from Michigan wishes to offer the 1918 section of the law, so far as all the rates, exemptions, and other provisions are concerned. It seems to me that it should be in order, under our procedure here, for him to amend such sections of the House text, unamended by the committee, as may be necessary, in order to have a vote in the Senate in the alternative between the 1918 rates and the rates recommended by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that could be done by the Senator offering the full provisions referred to by him as a substitute for the committee amendments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; under ordinary procedure that could not be done.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I thought the Senator was going to ask unanimous consent to do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thought I had asked unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought so.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator has covered a little more territory than he meant to. Surely he does not mean that any one of us should be able to rise out of the regular order and move an amendment to the administrative sections, for example. I do not think the Senator wants that. That is not the orderly way to consider the bill.

I would suggest, if I may have a moment more, that the best way to get at this is for the Senator from Utah to withhold his request for unanimous consent until after we have considered the income-tax schedules.

Mr. SMOOT. To what consent request has the Senator reference?

Mr. REED. I thought the Senator had asked unanimous consent that the committee amendments be taken up first.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have not asked that.

Mr. REED. I beg pardon; I was erroneously informed that the Senator had done so.

The next thing to do, then, is to go ahead, and the income-tax schedules come first. The Senator from Michigan can offer his amendment, and when that is offered, then perhaps we can get unanimous consent to consider committee amendments first.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That would be satisfactory to me. Of course, the Senator from Texas also has a schedule, the 1922 rates, which he desires to offer.

Mr. SMOOT. They can be offered at the same time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It will apply to all amendments to the particular section. Therefore I withdraw my request.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I submit an amendment and ask that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I offered a schedule, and I think it must be similar to that offered by the Senator from Michigan. I previously offered it here in the Senate, and it was referred to the Committee on Finance. There is no necessity of my reoffering this amendment, as the Senator from Michigan has offered one in similar terms which covers practically the same thing.

But I do not want the consideration to proceed to such a point that I can not offer such an amendment in case it should not be offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that an amendment presented and referred to a committee can not be considered in the Senate unless it is offered in the Senate and ordered to lie on the table, and it can be called from the table when the appropriate provision in the bill is reached.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I offered an amendment on April 26, and had it referred to the Committee on Finance. It was voted on in the Committee on Finance and voted down. It was again offered this morning and is now on the table, although not printed. It is the same amendment I offered on April 26, but the page references are different, although the rates are identical. The amendment had to be reoffered after the completion of the bill by the Committee on Finance, because of the differences in the page numbers. But in every other respect the amendment that was offered on April 26, 1932, and which is now available, is the same as that I offered this morning.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I think I had the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognized the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. All right. The RECORD will show, Mr. President, that I had previously yielded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled.

Mr. LONG. What is the maximum surtax provided under the amendment of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COUZENS. In the amendment I have included the entire 1918 schedule, without any deviation in any respect, both as to normal taxes, surtaxes, exemptions, and earned income has been removed from the amendment; so that in every respect, if this amendment should be agreed to, the law would be the same as the 1918 act.

Mr. LONG. That is, the war-time rates.

The VICE PRESIDENT subsequently said: The Chair desires to make a statement. The Chair finds, upon an examination of the RECORD, that there was an error made this morning; that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], instead of surrendering the floor, as the Chair thought, had only yielded to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], and that the Senator from Louisiana was, in fact, entitled to the floor.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 8, line 2, where the committee proposed, after the words "Title IX," to strike out "or section 811 (c)," so as to read:

TITLE I.—INCOME TAX

SUBTITLE A.—INTRODUCTORY PROVISIONS

SECTION 1. Application of title: The provisions of this title shall apply only to the taxable year 1932 and succeeding taxable years. Income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes for taxable years preceding the taxable year 1932 shall not be affected by the provisions of this title, but shall remain subject to the applicable provisions of prior revenue acts, except as such provisions are modified by Title IX of this act or by legislation enacted subsequent to this act.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, inasmuch as my amendment covers all of the provisions in Title I, I make the parliamentary inquiry as to whether it is in order to take up this amendment in its entirety, or must it be confined to the specific amendment made by the committee?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senator ask unanimous consent to take up the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Chair understands, the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is offered as a substitute. It can be offered at this time, and it would be subject to amendment, the same as the provisions which are proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. COUZENS. Then I offer this amendment, to strike out all of subtitle B of Title I, and to insert the amendment which I have proposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that this amendment does not relate to the first amendment of the committee, which has just been read. If that may be disposed of, then the Senator's amendment will be in order. The pending amendment is on page 8, line 2.

Mr. SMOOT. That is just a formal amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will now read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Michigan offers the following amendment:

Amendments proposed by Mr. COUZENS to the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, viz:

On page 9, strike out lines 19 to 25, both inclusive, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"(a) 6 per cent of the first $4,000 of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits against net income provided in section 25; and

"(b) 12 per cent of the remainder of such excess amount."

Strike out lines 5 to 25, both inclusive, on page 10, all of pages 11, 12, 13, and 14, and lines 1 to 22, both inclusive, on page 15, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"Upon a net income of $5,000 there shall be no surtax; upon net incomes in excess of $5,000 and not in excess of $6,000, 1 per cent of such excess.

"$10 upon net incomes of $6,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $6,000 and not in excess of $8,000, 2 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$50 upon net incomes of $8,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $8,000 and not in excess of $10,000, 3 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$110 upon net incomes of $10,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $10,000 and not in excess of $12,000, 4 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$190 upon net incomes of $12,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $12,000 and not in excess of $14,000, 5 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$290 upon net incomes of $14,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $14,000 and not in excess of $16,000, 6 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$410 upon net incomes of $16,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $16,000 and not in excess of $18,000, 7 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$550 upon net incomes of $18,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $18,000 and not in excess of $20,000, 8 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$710 upon net incomes of $20,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $20,000 and not in excess of $22,000, 9 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$890 upon net incomes of $22,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $22,000 and not in excess of $24,000, 10 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$1,090 upon net incomes of $24,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $24,000 and not in excess of $26,000, 11 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$1,310 upon net incomes of $26,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $26,000 and not in excess of $28,000, 12 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$1,550 upon net incomes of $28,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $28,000 and not in excess of $30,000, 13 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$1,810 upon net incomes of $30,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $30,000 and not in excess of $32,000, 14 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$2,090 upon net incomes of $32,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $32,000 and not in excess of $34,000, 15 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$2,390 upon net incomes of $34,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $34,000 and not in excess of $36,000, 16 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$2,710 upon net incomes of $36,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $36,000 and not in excess of $38,000, 17 per cent in addition of such excess.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the amendment which has just been read by the clerk would reinstate the 1918 income-tax rates with all of the exemptions then applying. The amendment is exactly in the same form as the country became accustomed to in 1918. If these rates should be adopted we would be able to raise enough income without taxing production or consumption at all. It is my view that any tax which curtails production and consumption is a bad tax and not in the interest of improvement in business.

I have had placed on the wall of the Chamber several charts which show the rates in the acts of the different years. For example, one chart shows the rates in 1913, 1916, 1917, 1918, 1919, 1921–22, then the rates adopted by the House, and the rates of 1924. The rates which I am recommending to be adopted are indicated by the top line on the chart.

What I am about to mention is referred to particularly because there may be some objection that the taxes apply to those in the lower brackets to a very great extent. In 1918, with an exemption of $2,000 for a married man and $1,000 for a single man and $200 for each child or dependent, a man with a net income after these deductions paid $60 income tax on an income of $3,000. My contention is that if a man with a net income in 1918, with the high cost of living in 1918, could afford to pay $60 income tax, he can afford to pay $60 income tax in 1932. In other words, the tax would not be nearly so burdensome or high as it was in 1918 with the then high cost of living.

The same man with $3,000 net income paid $40 in 1919, $20 in 1922, $8 in 1924, and nothing in 1926 and 1928. The House bill provided that he would pay $3 under their rates. The Finance Committee rate would have compelled him to pay $4. It will not be necessary for me to go through each one of the groups. I have had them displayed in this form for the sake of simplicity so that Senators would be able to see in actual dollars and cents what would have to be paid by each of the groups all the way up to incomes of $1,000,000 and over.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will put the charts in the RECORD, too.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; I shall be very glad to do so.

For example, under the 1918 rate a man with $1,000,000 income would have paid $703,030 income tax. Under the bill as it comes from the committee he would pay $492,940. It is estimated, based on the best information we have, that there are still 70 people in the United States with incomes of $1,000,000 or more. Perhaps the best way to get the effect of the 1918 rate is to estimate the number of taxpayers in each of the groups.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the chart to which the Senator has been referring show what the tax would be on these various items under the Senator's amendment?

Mr. COUZENS. My amendment provides for a return to the 1918 rates. Here [indicating] is the schedule at the top showing that those were the highest rates; in other words, a man with $100,000 income, under the 1918 rate, would pay $35,030, while under the recommendation of the Committee on Finance, and according to the rate now in the bill, he would pay $28,440. There [indicating] is a graph showing the variations in the rates for the different years.

Under the 1928 rates there were 83,100 returns of those having a net income of $1,000 a year or less. The net income of that number of taxpayers was some $50,000,000, and the taxes paid amount to nine-tenths of 1 per cent on the net income of the group. It is estimated, if we return to the 1918 rates, that the tax on that class of incomes will be at the rate of 1.38 per cent. So, even going back to the highest rates that I propose, a man in that class would only be required to pay 1.38 per cent of his income.

The aggregate number of taxpayers filing returns under the 1928 law was 2,711,535. Under the rate which my amendment provides there would be an increase in tax returns to 7,125,035, thus accomplishing, to a large degree, what the Treasury Department and everyone else knows ought to be accomplished, namely, a wider base for taxation. This wider base is brought about by a lowering of the exemptions. The amendment which I propose reduces exemptions for a married man from $3,500 to $2,000 and for a single man from $1,500 to $1,000. That reduction will account for the larger number of returns which will be received.

Now I want to point out where, under this proposal, the large income will come from, because it will be contended that under existing conditions we may not expect that so many tax returns will be filed. Take, for example, the number of returns in the bracket from $3,000 to $5,000 to which I have just been calling the attention of the Senate. There will be 1,251,000 such returns, and the Government would get $110,000,000 in revenue. That would figure an average tax of $87.93 per person from those in the class receiving incomes of from three to five thousand dollars.

We have taken the estimate of returns based on the experience of 1921, and, after allowing for a lesser number of returns because of depressed conditions, we have taken off 10 per cent further than the estimated smaller number in the different groups. We estimate that, based on this new schedule, we will receive an income of $1,134,074,000. That is the estimate after deducting $126,000,000 from the estimates based on a leeway allowed because of depressed conditions.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. COUZENS. I do.

Mr. DILL. Has the Senator stated how much more revenue it is estimated the rates proposed by him will raise than the rates proposed by the Senate committee?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; I have the figures here somewhere.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. COUZENS. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Am I right in gathering from the statement the Senator just made that this source of revenue alone will produce more than the aggregate provided by the entire bill as reported by the committee?

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no; it will produce more than all the sales taxes, I said.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What is that?

Mr. COUZENS. I said all the sales taxes; that is, the excise taxes on all articles may be eliminated by adopting this proposal. It will not, in my judgment, permit the elimination of the increase in postage rates; it will not, in my judgment, permit the elimination of the stamp taxes. It will permit, however, the exemption in the case of theater admissions being 45 cents instead of 10 cents. The committee first agreed, and so far as I remember, unanimously, to exempt all theater tickets up to 45 cents. Then, when we adopted the Mills bill we reduced the exemption to 10 cents, so that everybody attending a theater and paying over 10 cents for his ticket would be required to pay a 10 per cent admission tax. It is the judgment of most of us, I think, that to tax theater admissions of 10 cents and above is going to the heights of absurdity. It is true there would be some $40,000,000 difference in revenue because of the reduced exemption, but I submit that the $40,000,000 is taken from a group of our citizens who ought not have begrudged to them the little joy they now get out of a 10, 15, 25, or 30 cent theater. However, the committee went to that extreme rather than to raise the taxes in the high-income brackets.

I will admit that the program I propose will not permit doing away with all the nuisance taxes, but it will permit the doing away with all taxes on production.

If I make any errors in my figures, I hope the Senator from Utah will correct me, because I was not prepared to go on to-day; I did not think we would reach the bill so quickly; but I have given some thought to the question and compiled some figures, and, I repeat, if I have made any errors in the figures or shall make any errors, I want the Senator from Utah to correct me.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator what his estimate is of the additional tax the Government will receive under his amendment?

Mr. COUZENS. It will be $330,000,000 more than will be derived from the similar provision of the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I requested the department to give me an estimate of the increased amount which would be obtained if the Senator's proposal were adopted, and that estimate is $193,000,000.

Mr. COUZENS. I assume that any estimates may be controverted but the judgment of Mr. Parker, who represents the joint tax committee, I assume is as sound as is the judgment of some other employee of the Treasury Department. Obviously the Treasury Department wants to make the estimate as low as possible on these rates, because it does not want to adopt them. When the department is unfriendly to a proposal it is not difficult for them to picture it in as bad a light as possible. I am not charging them with any deliberate misconduct, but they have probably been ultraconservative in estimating that only $193,000,000 additional revenue will be derived from the 1918 rates over the revenue which will be derived from the rates now in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. It must be admitted, I think, that there were men in 1922 who were receiving incomes of a million dollars or two million dollars or even three million dollars a year who will not pay a cent of taxes this year.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not agree with the Senator as to that. I contend—I may be slightly in error in my estimate—that there are still 70 people in the United States who receive incomes of a million dollars a year or more. That number is not a high estimate. I wonder what has become of all the dividends that have been paid by many industries up to date? Only recently have they been commencing to suspend dividends; but there is all the interest on the railroad securities and on utility securities and on other enterprises that have billions of dollars of outstanding obligations.

Mr. SMOOT. But none of them are paying dividends now. Many of the great industrial concerns in the United States have omitted dividend payments.

Mr. COUZENS. But some are paying dividends; many of the banks are paying dividends.

Mr. SMOOT. But in most cases half the amount which was formerly paid.

Mr. COUZENS. I am not saying how much they are paying.

Mr. SMOOT. Take the Union Pacific Railroad, which yesterday declared a dividend of only 1½ per cent. I could name many of the great concerns, including railroads, that are not paying a single cent in dividends.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes, but I have waived dividends; I am talking about securities; and I say that interest is being paid on them. The astounding thing is that the Government is providing money for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to continue paying interest on the outstanding indebtedness of all the railroads. So the railroad-bond interest, at least, has not defaulted. Then there are all the power interests, all the utilities, and various industries that are paying interest on their outstanding mortgages and indebtedness. Somebody is receiving the interest thus being paid.

Mr. SMOOT. But no dividends whatever.

Mr. COUZENS. I understand there are also some dividends being paid.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know of any.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator want to check it up? If so, I will send for Moody's Manual and show that there are thousands of concerns in the United States still paying dividends.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator was talking about electric light and power companies.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes. Take the Detroit Edison Co., in my home city, that great corporation is still paying 8 per cent. Does the Senator mean to imply that none of the power companies and none of the utility companies are paying any dividends?

Mr. SMOOT. If they are, they can be counted on the fingers of one hand.

Mr. COUZENS. I deny that statement, Mr. President, because it is not the fact.

Mr. SMOOT. I know, Mr. President, of a great many of them; I have seen their statements, and they are not paying dividends this year.

Mr. COUZENS. What about the $400,000,000 profits in short sales, for instance? Are there no profits being made anywhere? Evidently the Senator from Utah has not studied very thoroughly what is going on in the New York Stock Exchange.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not say there are no profits being made anywhere.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator said there were no dividends being paid. It does not make any difference what technical name is used; call them dividends or any other name you choose, it is immaterial.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not say that no dividends are being paid; I said dividends have been reduced and reduced greatly, and many of the large concerns are paying no dividends.

Mr. COUZENS. I know that, and I am taking that into account. I have taken that into account in the estimates, and that is also taken into account in the estimates that Mr. Parker has made, and, based on an analysis of the income-tax returns of 1921, which was a bad year, allowing for the reduction in dividends, we believe that we can collect over $300,000,000 more by these rates than can be collected by the rates of the committee bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. COUZENS. I do.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In regard to the income of the utilities furnishing electricity, I have here from the Bureau of Labor Statistics the figures for 1928, 1929, and 1930. It is shown that all the charges for services in 12 of the largest cities of the United States are the same as they were four years ago.

Mr. SMOOT. That is up to 1930. We are in 1932 now.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have not the figures for 1931.

Mr. SMOOT. I am talking about 1932.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am talking about the charges for electrical service.

I ask unanimous consent to have these figures inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, referring to what the Senator from Utah says, I have just had my secretary hand me some figures which I had prepared for the proper occasion; but, as I say, I was rushed into this debate this afternoon, not expecting that we would reach the matter so early. These are the average monthly dividends as shown by the survey of current business of the Department of Commerce of a representative and comparative group of corporations:

In 1927 the monthly dividends were $174,000,000. I will not give the odd figures. In 1928 they were $193,000,000; in 1929, $289,000,000; in 1930, $352,138,000; in 1931, $308,108,000. The average monthly interest charges paid out in 1927 were $289,000,000; in 1928, $308,000,000; in 1929, $342,000,000; in 1930, $364,000,000; and in 1931, $379,000,000.

When we listen to Mr. Schwab and some of the inspired writers we would think that there is not any more money left in the world; that there is not any more income; that everybody is broke. Everyone knows that the country is greatly depressed; yet no one will claim that we are not doing any business; that there are no incomes anywhere. Certainly the great railroads, certainly the great power interests, certainly the great utility companies, certainly the great gas companies, are not in the hands of receivers, and why? Because they have continued, in most cases, to charge the rates that they have been charging, regardless of the decreased cost of doing business or of performing the service. They have made, and continue to make, stupendous profits; and they are paying all of the interest on their underlying obligations and millions and millions of dividends.

It is the height of absurdity to say that the American people have not any income. It can not be proved. Anyone who attempts to lead the public or anyone to believe that America is dead is doing the very thing that they have been preaching not to do, and that is to sell America short. When they want to escape taxes, when they want to preserve their incomes, when they want to avoid their responsibilities, then they contend that America has been sold short. When they are getting out to boom business, to increase sales, to increase profits, then they say, "Do not sell America short."

So it can not be contended that there is no national income. If there be national income—as I contend and everyone knows there is—sufficiently high taxation can be placed upon it, without doing undue injury to anyone, to balance the Budget without any consumption taxes other than those we have usually had, such as those on tobacco.

I admit that under these depressed conditions the corporation tax and the income tax are not adequate to balance the Budget; and I frankly said that in spite of the rates which I propose in this amendment we shall have to tax theaters on admissions in excess of 45 cents; we shall have to have the increase in postage rates, and we shall have to have the 2-cent tax on checks. If we can avoid all of these consumption taxes—and I still contend that a consumption tax is a vicious tax—if we are to reemploy the unemployed, if we are to get the unemployed back to work, little or no handicap should be placed on production and consumption.

I submit that if there are only some 7,000,000 people with incomes of more than $1,000 who would have to make returns under these rates, there must be tens and tens of millions of our people who do not make even that minor income; and yet under the sales tax we propose to do the vicious thing of keeping down the rates on the 7,000,000 people who can pay and placing the burden of some $200,000,000 which is to be proposed by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] on those least able to pay. In other words, to avoid income taxes for some 7,000,000 people able to pay, we propose to put on the people $200,000,000 of taxation to prevent their consuming.

In other words, the general sales-tax advocates propose to add to the cost of every lead pencil, every book, every school supply that the children use. They propose to add to the cost of every kitchen utensil, every stove in the home of a man who is living on $1,000 a year or less. They propose to tax every spoon, every knife, every plate, every dish, every curtain, every hanging, every piece of equipment in the bathroom, every bathtub, every single thing that is necessary in a home, almost as necessary as food and clothing. They propose to raise $200,000,000 from those people who have the greatest difficulty in avoiding going over the economic precipice—what for? To save raising $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 from 7,000,000 citizens who are unqualifiedly able to pay.

This proposal should not rest on personalities. This proposal should rest upon its merits. I know some of the conversation that is going on. The personal situation of any particular Senator, or the individuality of any proponent or opponent, is immaterial. These problems to be settled in the Senate should be based on their merits, no matter from whom they come. If this proposal has not any merit, of course I do not expect that it will receive any votes. I am unable, however, by any stretch of the imagination, to understand why a corporation that is struggling to get along, a partnership, or a private business man struggling to keep his head above water should be penalized by paying a sales tax that it may or may not be possible to pass on to the ultimate consumer.

I submit that that proposal drives every business house and every business man to cut wages, to discharge employees, so as to keep down his selling price and enable him to compete with his perhaps more fortunate competitor who is able to absorb the tax.

Let us take, for example, two manufacturers, one of whom is well equipped financially and efficient. He has a sales tax of 2 per cent or 1 per cent added to his cost of production and the less fortunate one has to meet that condition. Let us assume that the more fortunate one absorbs the 2 per cent and the less fortunate one then has to try to absorb it. What does he do? He immediately starts out to depress labor, to depress wages, to economize, to lay off all the help he possibly can, so that he may compete and absorb the tax which his more fortunate competitor has been able to absorb.

That is the picture if it is contended that these sales taxes will be absorbed. The other picture is: If they are not absorbed, that they are passed on to be paid, in the great, great majority of cases, by the class of our citizens who have the greatest difficulty in maintaining their economic existence.

What excuse, what reason, can anybody advance for not being willing to pay those modest taxes for the sake of keeping industry together and for the sake of not having to penalize sales and consumption? There never was a consumption tax that was justified, unless it was the liquor and tobacco taxes.

Here is a man getting $5,000 a year. Would that man prefer to pay $180 income taxes on $5,000 a year and have no curb put on production and consumption, or would he prefer to be forced into a competitive situation where his salary might be reduced a thousand dollars a year? Would he prefer to pay $180 upon a net income of $5,000 or to be laid off and discharged so that competitors in business, if you please, may be able to absorb an indefensible and inexcusable sales tax? How can the unemployed be put back to work if we are going to curb production, if we are going to make buying more difficult, if we are going to raise the cost of things? How are people going to buy—and, without buying, how can men be returned to work?

While on that point I want to point out another matter that is generally overlooked.

There is not one chance in a million to put the unemployed back to work on the necessities of life. The men and women who are working to-day are supplying practically all of the necessities of life; so where are our seven or eight million men who are out of work to be put back? The only place that they can be put back to work is on the so-called luxuries that are taxed in this infamous bill—a bill written in almost every detail by a group that has little understanding of the needs of the thirty or forty million workers other than the 7,000,000 proposed to be taxed under this amendment.

What excuse has anyone to make for requiring a man to pay $830 on a $10,000 income? Is it better for a man to have his $10,000 income maintained, and pay $830, or is it better to have his income cut to $7,500, or have the possibility of being laid off because of an infamous sales tax, which drives the manufacturer and the producer to cut every possible cost, to cut salaries, and to cut help, so that he can pay the sales tax. There is no justification, under any sound economics or even under the Government's necessities of the moment, as great as they are, for placing such an infamous tax as the consumption tax on every commodity outside of food and clothing.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. One of the great merits of the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] is that practically all taxes are paid out of income, and that the man with little or no income is not taxed.

Mr. COUZENS. There never was a more just conception of taxes. What does Mr. Hearst say in all his editorials? I am sorry that I am not fully prepared to-day, owing to the fact that I did not know this question would be reached so soon; but I shall have something more to say before the consideration of the tax bill is concluded. What has Hearst said in his editorials for months? He has been urging and urging a sales tax; and what for? Frankly, to eliminate the unsound income taxes.

The junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] read in the Finance Committee an editorial written by Mr. Hearst, in which he said that if Congress were not so cowardly they would impose a sales tax, and that then it would not be necessary to raise the income taxes.

The proponents of a sales tax are organized, some of them innocently drawn into the vortex of the demand for a sales tax. And what is the motive back of the move? The purpose is to take the tax off of wealth.

Another very subtle piece of propaganda that is going around is the statement in dozens of letters I have received, "We demand that you vote for a sales tax." I observe, however, that practically all of these letters were dictated to stenographers and written on typewriters. They are not written in longhand, as are the letters emanating from a great majority of our people who have to write by hand with pen and ink and who do not have stenographers and typewriters to do their letter writing for them.

These letters we receive say, "We want a painless tax." The man who proposes the painless tax, the tax that is felt the least, is worse than a communist so far as the welfare of the Government is concerned.

Just as soon as there is established a painless tax and all pressure upon the taxpayer is relieved, then we will have to submit to minority groups for appropriations. Why have we gone on and built up this great bureaucracy? Why have we our Budget so high? Because it was a sort of a painless tax we were collecting. We kept on reducing the taxes down to a point where they became less painful.

Now it is apparent that there is going to be some painful taxation instead of painless taxation. As soon as taxation becomes painless we may as well say good-by to efficient and economical government.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me suggest to the Senator from Michigan that in a time of depression like this, when most businesses and most individuals are either making no profits at all or are actually suffering losses, the virtue of an income tax in this kind of a situation is greater than ever, because it is a tax only on profits, whereas a consumption tax may be a tax not only on losses but on necessities. If a man has an income, he has profits, and he can pay a tax and still have sufficient left to prevent hardship and suffering.

Mr. COUZENS. That is what I am trying to point out. The unfairness of a sales tax is that it taxes losses. If one is running a plant and producing and doing the best he can, under the present conditions, he is required to pay the Government a 1 or 2 per cent sales tax so as to save money for the man who is making a profit or an income. Is there any justification or equality in taxation that adopts such a philosophy as that?

I venture to say that among 96 Senators there are not 96 letters received from those who have to use pen and ink supporting a sales tax. It will be found that all big business and all the manufacturers, who maintain stenographers and typewriters, propose a painless sales tax, a sales tax which taxes the all-day sucker of the children, the candy, the school supplies, all hospital facilities, every piece of surgical goods, all bed clothing, every conceivable thing—not to raise revenue; that is not the purpose. The purpose is to get rid of the income tax and the estate taxes.

I do not claim, Mr. President, that everyone who is proposing a sales tax is conscious of that fact. There are many good citizens who are not conscious of the drive in which they are participating. But do not forget, Mr. President, that the master mind originated this, and the master mind expects to drive Congress into adopting a tax system which is indefensible, and done for the sole purpose of saving those best able to pay from paying taxes.

I am unconcerned about whether or not Canada has a manufacturers' sales tax. I have not the slightest doubt that Canada is controlled by the same dominant influences which attempt to control the United States. To the credit of the House of Representatives, notwithstanding the inspired articles and inspired editorials, they did a splendid and fine thing when they eliminated the consumption and sales tax from the bill that was foisted on them by the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Upon the assumption that the sales tax in nearly every instance is passed on to the consumer, when it reaches the consumer is it not in practical effect a cumulative tax, is it not a pyramided tax, which grows from the start to the consumer?

Mr. COUZENS. I am glad the Senator raised that question, because that is one thing I want to discuss, and I really am somewhat unprepared to-day. I did not think this question was to be reached so soon, as I said before.

The Canadian system, it was argued in the Committee on Finance and in the House, prevents pyramiding by exempting the manufacturer from paying a sales tax on goods on which the previous producer has paid a tax, but I submit that it is just as subtle to talk about not having any pyramiding through that method as it is to say that a tariff is not pyramided. I submit that if I import, as a merchant, a hundred dollars' worth of goods, and pay a 30 per cent tariff, I demand a profit on my $30 invested in a tariff, just the same as I demand a profit on the $100 I invested in my merchandise. So, if a manufacturer invests $100,000 in taxes when he sells his goods, does anybody think he is so stupid that he does not ask remuneration and profit on the $100,000 he invested in taxes?

I admit that a sales tax, under the Canadian plan, is not so objectionable, from the standpoint of pyramiding, as a sales tax which did not have the licensing scheme whereby a manufacturer would be licensed so as to avoid the duplication of taxing the same commodity.

Now I want to point out how soft we are, how we have gotten to the easy-money stage, and I want to tell a little about what England has had to stand in the way of income taxes in order to balance her budget. I am not saying this because I think the United States ought to emulate any other country. I am just trying to put a little backbone into us, so that we will not begin to cry and whine because we have some taxes to pay.

A man in England with an income of $3,000 a year, based on the British pound at the present rate, would pay a tax of $453 against $60, which a citizen of the United States would have to pay on the same income.

A man with an income of $5,000 a year would pay $180 in the United States under the proposed rates, not the existing rates, and in Great Britain he pays $703.

In the United States, under the proposed rates, an income of $10,000 would have to pay $838 and in Great Britain $1,828.

Let us commence to shed some tears for the big income-tax fellows. For example, take the man with an income of $200,000. He pays a tax of $109,863 a year in Great Britain against $93,000 in the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator figures for the $100,000 income?

Mr. COUZENS. In Great Britain on an income of $100,000 one has to pay $47,738 and in the United States, under the proposed rates, one would pay only $35,030.

We figured out that if the 1918 rates were adopted we would receive for the fiscal year 1933, $486,000,000 additional and for the fiscal year 1934 $810,000,000 additional. That would eliminate, as I said, all consumption taxes. We could even waive consideration of what we might or might not get from the additional estate taxes. It was estimated that we would get only about $20,000,000 from that source this year. We figured practically nothing from gift taxes this year.

While I made the estimate only roughly and am not pressing it, I still believe that corporations could pay an 18 per cent profits tax, especially in view of the fact that the committee has eliminated a 1½ per cent extra charge for filing consolidated returns. My own view is that there is no justification in the world for permitting the filing of consolidated returns. But big business has a great many friends and big business makes a very plausible excuse for being granted permission to file consolidated returns.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the Senator a question or two about consolidated returns. Will there be an attempt made to eliminate the consolidated-return feature of the bill? Will we have an opportunity to vote on an amendment that would accomplish that end?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; if the Senator will introduce it.

Mr. NORRIS. That might be easy to do, but I am depending on members of the committee who feel as the Senator from Michigan does. There are a number of Senators who feel that way.

Mr. COUZENS. I have attended this year 160 committee meetings, and I am unable to stand here all day and fight what I think is objectionable in the bill after having done it in the committee. I submit that some other Senators will have to assume some of the responsibility if they want to do all the things they seem to have in mind.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to find out from the Senator what the difference would be in payment of taxes as between using the consolidated return and not using it.

Mr. COUZENS. I am told that it has been estimated from $10,000,000 to $25,000,000, but no one knows as a matter of fact. It is the poorest kind of estimate. For example, in the hearings before the Finance Committee an oil representative testified that all of the losses which they had encountered in the production of oil they had been permitted to deduct from the profits on a pipe line. Now ordinarily no one should object to a consolidated return when an industry is confined exclusively to one activity, and because of the demands of a State they are required to form a separate corporation within that State to transact their ordinary business. In such a case a consolidated return is perfectly justified, in my opinion. So that, because of these justifications, it is not quite a simple matter to condemn all consolidated returns. But there are common stockholders in diversified businesses or diversified industries who are enabled, by the permission granted to file a consolidated return, to wipe out all of their taxes on their profitable enterprises by deducting their losses on their unprofitable enterprises.

I do not know how far this has gone, but I want to point out the possibilities of such a thing. For instance the Senator from Nebraska and I might be competing. I could run at a loss because I had another business against which I could charge my losses. He has no other business from which he makes a profit, so I get the advantage of being able to stand my losses through deductions from the profits on another business by making consolidated returns and thus having a decided advantage in competition. But it is an artificial form of competition. I do not object to natural and proper competition, but I do complain about artificial competition permitted in this way through an act of Congress.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Senator spoke a moment ago of corporation taxes. Is the Senator in a position to place in the RECORD a table stepping up corporation taxes to 20 per cent, thereby disclosing what revenues would probably accrue to the Government under successive percentage tax assessments?

Mr. COUZENS. I have not the information in form to submit as the Senator suggests. I made an effort through several devices to balance the Budget, and in doing so I took the 1918 rates and figured that we would receive $486,000,000 on that basis. If we adopted the 18 per cent tax on corporations we would raise $112,000,000 more from corporations. We figured that by means of the administrative amendment put in the bill by the Ways and Means Committee and approved by the House and recommended by the Treasury Department, we could prevent a lot of evasions or close a lot of loopholes, and by that process save approximately $200,000,000 more. If we have $80,000,000 to $100,000,000, as I understand is reported by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], obviously the higher the rate the more advantages would be gained by closing the loopholes. I figured that with the stock-transfer tax and admission tax on admissions of 45 cents and over, and with a reduction in Government expenses, we would account for $1,245,000,000, and it requires $1,241,000,000 to balance the Budget. So in the proposal I have made we would adopt the 1918 rates, the 18 per cent corporation-profits tax, make the saving of $200,000,000 in administration of the law through closing of the loopholes and preventing of evasions, and altogether we could balance the Budget without a single burdensome tax such as are included in the sales tax or excise tax.

I have seen statements by some of the inspired writers that "sales tax" is a misnomer, that it should be called an excise tax. They recognize the odium which has been attached to the term "sales tax," and now they want to dignify it by calling it an excise tax; but no matter by what name it is called, it is a tax on consumption. I submit that if the country is to recover at all it has got to increase consumption—not the consumption of necessities, because the necessities are now being supplied, but we have got to increase the use of what Congress has presumed to call luxuries, such as radios, phonographs, automobiles, and all of those things upon which the Congress has attempted to put a consumption tax.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was interested in the statement just submitted by the able Senator as to the amounts which will be raised on incomes under the 1918 rates. I was wondering how those figures were obtained. I know they are, of course, all more or less conjectures, as all of our guesses are, but I was wondering just what facts and data the Senator has in order to fortify the conclusions reached that the amount would be raised which he has just indicated.

Mr. COUZENS. I said previously in my remarks——

Mr. KING. I was detained in a committee meeting and hope the Senator will pardon me for asking the question.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not object, but I referred before to the fact that we took the 1921 returns, 1921 being a bad year, and deducted from them.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has been talking a good while now. If he will yield for that purpose, I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield for that purpose?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bailey	Connally	Hebert	McGill
Bankhead	Coolidge	Howell	McKellar
Bingham	Costigan	Johnson	McNary
Borah	Couzens	Jones	Metcalf
Bratton	Dale	Kean	Moses
Bulkley	Fess	Kendrick	Norris
Bulow	George	Keyes	Nye
Byrns	Glass	King	Oddie
Caraway	Hale	La Follette	Patterson
Carey	Harrison	Lewis	Robinson, Ark.
Cohen	Hatfield	Logan	Robinson, Ind.

Schall	Smoot	Townsend	Walsh, Mont.
Sheppard	Steiwer	Trammell	Watson
Shipstead	Stephens	Tydings
Shortridge	Thomas, Idaho	Vandenberg
Smith	Thomas, Okla.	Walsh, Mass.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN], the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], and the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] are detained in a committee meeting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I see the experts here are controverting each other as to the soundness of the estimates based upon the 1918 rates. If one confers with those gentlemen he will have to draw his own conclusions as to who is accurate; and I suppose that is what a jury always has to do when they hear from experts, and especially from doctors, college professors, and economists.

Mr. President, it is estimated that under the present law those filing income-tax returns showing incomes under a thousand dollars—and when I say that I mean after the exemptions are allowed—number only 83,100. Under the 1918 rates as of to-day there would be 374,000 such individuals filing tax returns. I mention this to show the widening of the base brought about by reducing the exemptions, not only for married persons but for single persons, and also the exemption on account of dependent children.

In the group from $1,000 to $2,000 under the present law as of to-day there are 650,900 returns filed; under the 1918 law, with the reduced exemptions, there would be 2,580,000, again showing how the base of income taxation would be widened.

In the $2,000 to the $3,000 group at present there are 530,900 returns filed. Under the 1918 rates there would be 2,290,000.

In the group of from $3,000 to $5,000—and that is the largest group of all so far as numbers under the present law are concerned—there are 816,600. Under the 1918 rates there would be 1,251,000.

I will skip some of these figures and will take, for example, the group consisting of those having incomes of from $10,000 to $25,000. Under the existing law persons in that group filed 161,500 returns. We estimate that under the new law there will be the same number of returns.

So in the aggregate 2,711,000 would pay taxes if the present law were maintained, while if the 1918 rates were adopted and made a part of the bill 7,125,035 returns would be filed.

I recognize that in view of the order in which the bill is arranged, the income-tax rates coming first, it is rather difficult to obtain an intelligent and understandable vote on this amendment at this early stage of the discussion. It might be properly said that the income-tax rates should be adjusted upon the basis of the needs of the occasion; I submit that that would be an equitable way of arranging the income-tax rates; but, under the parliamentary procedure, we can not deal with all the nuisance taxes, all the excise taxes, all the transfer taxes, all the stamp taxes, before considering the income-tax rates, but we have got to deal first with the income-tax rates. I submit that after the Senate has carefully gone through with this enormous bill and has had to contend with all the difficulties incident to dealing with all the nuisance, excise, and other taxes it will have a different attitude toward the income-tax rates from what it now has. If there are Senators who feel indisposed to vote for these rates now, they probably will be more disposed to vote for them after they have come in contact with the contentious paragraphs and sections in this bill taxing different services and different commodities. So I am going to have to suffer under the handicap, apparently, of a vote being had on the income-tax rates prior to the Senate having had an opportunity to consider all the other contentious rates in the bill. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I will have to submit my case to a vote.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. COUZENS. I do.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I see under the proposal of the bill as it came from the House and also as reported by the Senate committee, the exemptions from the income tax have been reduced in the case of a married person or head of a family from $3,500 to $2,500, and in the case of a single person from $1,500 to $1,000. Has the Senator any data showing how much additional revenue over and above the expense of administration of that particular feature of the law the Government would obtain?

Mr. COUZENS. We do not consider that there will be any additional expense of administration because of the lowering of the exemptions. Individuals file the returns, anyway, only with a lesser exemption, that is all.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Under the present law—and I presume the same thing is carried into the measure we are now considering—an individual does not have to make a return unless his income amounts to a given sum.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true.

Mr. TRAMMELL. In other words, a person whose exemption is, say, $3,500 under the present law, with so much for his minor children, unless he has a net income in excess of his exemptions, does not have to make a return, and likewise a single person pays no tax unless his income is in excess of his exemptions. Therefore, by reducing the exemptions there would, of necessity, be filed a great many more returns, involving much more auditing in the administration of the law.

Mr. COUZENS. The income-tax returns in those cases are so simple that the auditing is almost inconsequential. It is the large income-tax returns, with the great number of deductions and complications, that make up the cost of administration, and not the returns of the small-salaried individuals or the small income-tax payers. I think the total Treasury Department expenses for the auditing of returns is only some $33,000,000.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I know on some previous occasions when we were considering the income tax there were certain data furnished to indicate that the expenses of administering the provision where the exemptions were reduced from $1,500 to $1,000 in the case of a single person and from $3,000 to $2,500 in the case of a married person would approximate the amount of the additional revenue which the Government would receive. I wondered if the committee had any information as to that. Of course, my personal views are that it would be very unfortunate to reduce the exemptions to the point suggested unless the Government gained a very substantial amount of revenue from lowering the exemptions contained in the present law.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Perhaps the chairman of the committee can give an explanation.

Mr. SMOOT. I can answer the Senator. The present exemption in the case of a married person is $3,500 and in the case of a single person $1,500. This bill reduces the exemption in the case of a married person to $2,000 and in the case of a single person to $1,000. The additional revenue which it is expected will be received under that change is $40,000,000.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I, of course, did not have any data on that subject.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the estimated additional revenue.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am surprised to find that it is $40,000,000, however. My position before was, and still is, that we should not impose an income tax upon a person until he has a sufficient amount to give him at least the ordinary comforts and necessities of life. If we exempt only persons having incomes of less than $1,000, I dare say that in the city of Washington and in many of the cities throughout the country, as well as in small places, a person can scarcely get along on $1,000 a year. Almost all persons, even single persons, have some obligations other than merely the matter of furnishing food and clothing and shelter for themselves.

Mr. COUZENS. But, Mr. President, I submit that this is the alternative of a sales tax. The married person with an income up to $2,000 will have no income tax to pay under this proposal; and certainly those with incomes of over $2,000 per year can afford to pay $30 or $40 to their Government in preference to having adopted the principle of an infamous sales tax.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am as much against the sales tax as the Senator from Michigan is; but that, of course, does not change my views in regard to the question of imposing an income tax upon a person before he has sufficient of the ordinary comforts and necessities of life.

Mr. COUZENS. If the Senator will suggest a substitute, that is all right. It does not cover the ground merely to oppose a tax. I am looking for a substitute for these taxes other than a sales tax, which is a tax upon consumption. If the Senator has any alternative proposal, all right.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think I have a record on the sales tax even before the Senator from Michigan came to the Senate, probably. When the matter came up here a good many years ago I was among the few Senators who took a very active part in opposition to the general sales tax proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. The RECORD will disclose that fact; so I have no brief in behalf of the sales-tax idea.

Mr. COUZENS. I was asking the Senator what he would substitute, then, for this income tax. What would the Senator substitute for it?

Mr. TRAMMELL. If it yields $40,000,000 per annum in excess of the cost of administration, I do not know that I have any particular item to offer now.

Mr. COUZENS. It yields $45,000,000 in this particular group of persons with incomes from $1,000 to $2,000 after the exemption; and that is more than the whole cost of administering the Treasury Department.

Mr. TRAMMELL. In other instances it has been contended here that the cost of administering the tax in these smaller brackets, where the exemption was reduced, amounted to almost as much as the income from those particular provisions of the law; and I was seeking information on the subject.

Mr. COUZENS. I desire to say that that is inaccurate because it does not cost more than 50 cents per income.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Not long since I received some data, which I think I have on my desk, to the effect that it cost at least $1.50 for each paper, and that the Government would receive only about that amount, on an average, on incomes between $1,500 and $1,000. Those data were sent to me, of course, by some one who was opposed to cutting the exemptions from $1,500 to $1,000, and from $3,500 to $2,500. I did not know as to the accuracy of the data; but I wanted to get some information upon the subject from the committee.

Personally I think that if we have the alternative of having either to accept this tax or to accept a sales tax, this, of course, is preferable. So far as I am concerned, however, I am not favorable to either one. I am not in favor of making this big reduction in the exemption, nor am I in favor of a general sales tax.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan if I understood him to say that the 1918 schedule of rates, according to his estimate, would produce enough revenue to enable us to eliminate all of the special excise or sales taxes except those on first-class postage, bank checks, and admissions below 45 cents?

Mr. COUZENS. It goes farther than that. When I first made up this table I had included an 18 per cent corporation tax, which would have brought an increase of $112,000,000; but we will eliminate that from this consideration, for the sake of argument. I am not saying that we should eliminate it entirely. We can balance the Budget by adopting these rates and leaving out every single excise or consumption tax. We should be required to put in the postal increases and the admission tax above 45 cents. We should be able practically to accept the Treasury's estimate of increase in revenue by adding the check stamp tax, which was not included in my estimate; and we will assume for argument's sake that the Treasury Department's estimate of income, based on these figures, is more nearly right than Mr. Parker's. Then we could cover that up by the inclusion of the 2-cent stamp tax.

Mr. GEORGE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. COUZENS. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. Apropos of the income-tax suggested by the Senator as to married men, I am asked by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] whether there is anything in the bill that prohibits a bachelor from discussing a married man's income tax without confessing that he has expectations. [Laughter.]

Mr. COUZENS. Not a thing; but we ought to put a prohibition in it.

I have just been reminded of something that I overlooked awhile ago; and I am afraid I have not discussed it in a very orderly way, because I was not prepared. It has been suggested, however, that if we get these rates up to the point shown on this chart, whereby a man with an income of a million dollars net would pay $703,000, or a man with an income of $500,000 net would pay $320,000, or a man with an income of $200,000 net would pay $101,000, or a man with an income of $100,000 would pay $35,000, they would be driven to invest in tax-exempt securities.

That is not evidenced by the experience of the Treasury Department. For example, when the Committee on Finance convened to take up the revenue bill, the committee approved a motion I put to secure the returns of all estates over $3,000,000 of persons dying from September 1, 1928, up until the present year; and the department made a return of the estates that were filed during that period. We did not ask for returns in the case of estates of less than $3,000,000—only for those of $3,000,000 or over. The Treasury Department furnished a list of some 285 names, and the aggregate of these 285 estates—mind you, only those over $3,000,000—was $2,700,172,619.

Mr. NORRIS. For what time? How many years did it cover?

Mr. COUZENS. I am talking about the 285 returns made since September, 1928, of estates over $3,000,000. That is, I did not ask for the estates filed with assets of less than $3,000,000. The assets of the ones that filed estate returns of over $3,000,000 aggregated two billion seven hundred and odd million dollars. Then, after I got those figures, I asked the department to break them up so as to tell me what the assets in these estates were. After getting the name of every decedent, the date of his death, and the State from which he came, I asked them to furnish me with a list of all of the tax-exempt securities in these estates. I asked them, also, to furnish me a list of all other bonds included in the estates, all of the common stocks included in the estates, all of the preferred stocks, and all of the other property included in the estates.

The figures showed that of the total $2,700,000,000 assets of the estates, only $318,249,000 were in tax-exempt securities. Of common stocks there was $1,634,848,000; of other property, $522,000,000; of preferred stocks, $118,000,000; and of other bonds, $105,984,000. So that out of 285 estates filed over that period of time, only about 13 per cent of the assets were in tax-exempt bonds; and it is quite curious to observe that an analysis of these shows that that does not occur in the case of the active business men, but the majority of the cases where there are large amounts of tax-exempt securities will be found to be the estates of women or widows who have invested their money for security rather than for return.

I am not going to give the names of all of these cases, but I want to point out some of the largest ones.

There was one famous New Yorker who left an estate of approximately $72,000,000, and he had $2,000,000 of tax exempts.

There was another large estate in Massachusetts of $21,000,000 which had $2,000,000 of tax exempts.

There was another large estate in California that aggregated $13,000,000, and it had no tax exempts.

There was another case in New York of a gross estate of $20,000,000 and a fraction, with no tax exempts.

There was another great estate in New York with some $15,000,000 of assets and only $1,000,000 of tax exempts.

Then there was a very famous estate of approximately $122,000,000 with only $20,000,000 of tax exempts.

Then there was another estate of a very famous person of $76,000,000 who had some $15,000,000 of tax exempts.

There is one larger one here that I have not been able to lay my hands on.

Here is one large estate of $135,440,000 with not a single tax exempt.

An analysis of all of the returns showing the investments of these estates indicates that practically all of the tax exempts are in these estates either for the reason that the person had grown old and retired from business or for the reason that the estate was that of a woman who did not wish to take business hazards.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. WALSH of Montana addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield; and to whom?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator think, however, that if the 1918 rates were put in force they would go to tax-exempt securities?

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to ask if, during the existence of the high rates of 1918, Mr. George F. Baker sold his First National Bank of New York and took his money and put it into tax exempts? He did not.

Mr. SMOOT. He did not. Of course, he did not sell the bank.

Mr. COUZENS. And a survey of his estate does not show that he invested his earnings from the bank in tax exempts.

Mr. SMOOT. He may have sold his tax exempts after the rates were lowered.

Mr. COUZENS. I ask, did Mr. Andrew Mellon, during all the time of high income-tax rates, sell his Aluminum Co. of America, his Gulf Oil Co., his Standard Steel Car Co., his Mellon National Bank, and his 150 or more corporations, and put his money in tax exempts? He did not.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think he sold the businesses, but I can not say what he did in the matter of the investment of his income; and that was a great deal.

Mr. COUZENS. That is not important when there are excessive productive facilities.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to know from the Senator whether he has a record of the aggregate of the estates reported and the aggregate of the tax exempts?

Mr. COUZENS. That is the information I just gave the Senate. I just gave the Senate the aggregate of the estates, $2,700,000,000. That is the aggregate of the 285 estates, and the tax exempts amounted to $315,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I happened to be out of the Chamber. Can the Senator tell us what the percentage is?

Mr. COUZENS. I did not figure out percentages, but the tax exempts represented somewhere between 12 and 13 per cent. The great majority of the estates, with assets of some $1,600,000,000, are in common stock.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not true that the great bulk of tax-exempt securities are held by insurance companies, fiduciaries, and others, upon which no tax would be derived, regardless of whether they were tax exempt or otherwise?

Mr. COUZENS. That is absolutely true. For instance, a great many of the securities are in charitable trusts, in savings banks, insurance companies, fiduciary institutions, and in widows' trusts, where they do not take the hazards of business, and where they do not pay the normal tax.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is where the tax-exempt securities are, and that is where we would not collect, irrespective of the feature the Senator is discussing, because they pay no surtaxes.

Mr. COUZENS. That is entirely true; and I suggested to the Senator from Pennsylvania, and to other Senators in the Finance Committee, that if we could find any way to tax those securities which are in the hands of individuals, and are not exempt to the same extent as when held by corporations, I would be in favor of doing it. It looks as though there were some decisions in the Supreme Court which suggested that that might be possible. It has also been suggested that we might place an excise tax on the incomes from these securities. But if they are reachable, I would be in favor of reaching them, because there is no justification for anybody, no matter what his investments may be, evading his taxes at this time of depression.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator that the man who buys a tax-exempt bond pays his tax when he buys the bond.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true, except that he does not pay any Federal tax.

Mr. CONNALLY. But when he ties that into his inheritance or estate it is taxable, because they are subject to a tax.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. So the Federal Government through that source will get back a large revenue from what are otherwise known as tax-exempt securities.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true.

Mr. CONNALLY. And we raise that rate in this bill to 45 per cent maximum.

Mr. COUZENS. That is not high enough.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is higher than 20 per cent, the rate in the present law.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was wondering whether the Senator in the investigations which he has made, the results of which he has just submitted, ascertained whether or not in those large estates, aggregating more than $2,000,000,000, there was any evidence showing that in anticipation of death or for the purpose of evading inheritance or death dues after death the owners of tax-exempt securities got rid of them during their lifetime.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no. All I have is the figures, and I want to say that that loophole of transferring estates in anticipation of death has been, I think, substantially plugged up by the gift tax.

Mr. Parker advises me that of all the estates filed, including those I have just mentioned and those below $3,000,000, only 5.65 per cent of all the estates were in tax exempts.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that point, will he yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. There is just one observation I want to submit to the Senator. I notice he discussed the point that there is not such danger of investments being made in tax-exempt securities. As a matter of fact, does not the Senator think that one of the greatest benefits that could come to the country, particularly at this time, would be the encouragement of investments in municipal and State securities, when the municipalities and States can not finance themselves? It would afford a low interest charge, it would enable them to prosecute their public works, and there is no investment to be more encouraged to-day, and that would do the country more good, than the investment in tax exempts.

Mr. COUZENS. I wish it were possible to finance the State institutions without issuing tax exempts, but I admit the principle that the power to tax is the power to destroy. I want to say something in that connection, and I am glad the Senator from Louisiana reminded me of it.

For years and years, I think as far back as perhaps any of us can remember, there has been a philosophy, a practice, in fact, that we should save and save and save, that we should put back our earnings into productive industry, that we must not engage in any State, Federal, or municipal activity, because it diverted money from productive industry. In other words, every time we put a schoolhouse up, every time we built a museum, every time we built a library, every time we built a city hall, every time we built a county building, every time we built a theater, every time we built an office building, it was said that we were putting money into unproductive activities. I think I should exclude office buildings, and perhaps theaters, because, while they do not produce material, they do produce services.

It is quite well established, Mr. President, that we have carried that principle too far. There is absolutely no necessity for plowing back profits into industry, because industry has already expanded far beyond its needs. In other words, if we take the earnings, the surpluses of industry, which we have been taught we should save, and reinvest in industry, if we would discontinue the practice of saving and take the surplus earnings and invest them in what we call nonproductive activities, such as museums, opera houses, libraries, schoolhouses, we would be doing the best possible thing for the future of the country. It would be the best possible thing for industry itself, and it would be the best possible thing for all those who live below the margins of incomes we have just been discussing.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon just one more question?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. That would make it possible to-day to prosecute flood-control work; it would make possible the employment of many more people, something the Nation needs; it would make it possible to bridge the navigable streams; it would make it possible to build the highways, which activities, instead of being nonproductive enterprises, are enterprises for the production of facilities for the use of every living human in the country.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, one of the things that is said is that the money that is received up in the high brackets must be preserved and kept for productive industry; that these great earnings must be used for capital expansion. Yet, with all of the low brackets, with all the low rates now existing, and with the President issuing a statement last night to the effect that there was plenty of capital, but that it was not available, I submit, Mr. President, that had we taken these taxes from these brackets we are discussing, all through the past years, we would have been just as well off, because we would not have been able to get the money for capital investment, even though we did not take it for taxes.

It is quite obvious that the future policy might just as well be that the Government take these excess earnings, substantially all of these excess earnings, at least those in excess of that which is needed for productive industry, and it is quite evident, from the condition of the productivity of the Nation at this time, that we will not need capital to increase productivity for some decades to come.

A well-known professor from Cornell yesterday, in testifying before the Committee on Banking and Currency, said that, in all probability, if there is a continuance of the conditions under which we operate, the methods and policies we follow, most of us will be in our graves before we will be out of the morass of depression in which the country is now floundering.

I do not say that to throw out any word of despair or pessimism, or anything of that sort. I do recognize the conditions, and I recognize that we are following policies of the greatest folly and performing the greatest economic blunders right at this time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The argument has been advanced that it is unwise to increase the rates in the higher brackets, because that would dry up the sources of capital by taking the money out of the hands of the people who would conserve it and use it for increased capital for productive enterprise. What is the view of the Senator as to that?

Mr. COUZENS. I was trying to explain that, and I am afraid I did not make myself quite clear. The President said last night that there was plenty of capital. I have been trying to prove that we do not need these excess earnings for productive purposes, and if we do not need them for productive purposes, what is the objection to their going into the activities I have just been discussing, namely, the construction of schoolhouses, colleges, art museums, libraries, and so on?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I view the matter from a slightly different angle, and I would like to have the view of the Senator with respect to the matter. I think now we get relatively a small amount of productive capital from the great estates of very wealthy people. Capital now is raised, ordinarily, by the issuance of securities that are put on the market and sold to the general public. It was my understanding, at least, that the great bulk of capital for productive enterprise for the last 10 years had come from such sources.

Mr. COUZENS. To a large degree the Senator is right. But each of these great estates of which I have been speaking largely controls some enterprise in itself which perhaps does not go out into the market for money. I do not believe that the First National Bank, for instance, or any of these banks which have been largely controlled by one individual or one family go into the market for money. They usually retain control, and I think that is true of a great many large industries, such as the Ford Motor Co., the Gulf Oil Co., the Aluminum Co., and other industries which are controlled by wealthy families or small groups, and they often do not have to go into the market.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me suggest to the Senator the flotation of utility securities, running up into the billions in the last 10 years. True, such an enterprise is ordinarily promoted by some man of considerable wealth, but he actually gets the capital by the issuance of securities which are sold to the public.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; but the contention of the Senator from Utah and others is that if we get the rates too high those people who buy such securities will not buy them, but rather will buy municipal securities.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the securities are not bought exclusively by people who pay income taxes in the higher brackets.

Mr. COUZENS. But we are talking about all brackets.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They are bought by the men with incomes of $5,000, $10,000, or $20,000 a year. Latterly they have been peddled from house to house by canvassers and sold to people of small incomes, and in that way a very large amount of the capital, as I understand it, is now produced.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator is quite correct. Ever since the war, at least, we have never been short of productive capital or of all the capital needed for productive purposes. However, it has been one of the arguments used fallaciously against these rates that if we took too much, if we got the rates too high in the $100,000, $200,000, and $300,000 classes we will not have any money for capital. What an absurdity that has been found to be, after all these years!

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the investors do buy the tax-free bonds, they have to buy them from somebody and pay the money to somebody, and that releases new money, does it not?

Mr. COUZENS. That is correct. We lay too much stress upon who owns them. It is not who owns them, but what they own. In other words, just as the Senator from Texas said, it does not make much difference whether one person buys or another person sells, whatever the securities may be they are exempt, whether in the hands of the little man or the big man. What I was trying to point out is that there has never been any shortage of capital, and so no matter what rates are fixed there will not be any shortage of money for capital purposes.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COUZENS. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Is it the opinion of the Senator that there is no shortage of capital now for productive purposes?

Mr. COUZENS. I am absolutely satisfied and can prove, without fear of successful contradiction, that there is a surplus of capital in the country to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. Why then is it not used? Why do we not use it if there is a surplus? Why is there complaint of shortage of money by those who are engaged in productive enterprises?

Mr. COUZENS. I think there is plenty of capital, but it will not move.

Mr. LOGAN. Where is it?

Mr. COUZENS. It is in the banks, mostly.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator think the banks have plenty of capital?

Mr. COUZENS. I think that as the Federal Reserve Board have been buying up as much as $100,000,000 worth of Government bonds weekly for over five weeks, they have put money into the banks far in excess of what the banks have been willing to loan.

Mr. LOGAN. But is it not true that in the last few years there has been an enormous shrinkage of bank credits, and that probably many of the bonds and securities carried by banks at what they paid for them are not at this time worth any considerable part of what they paid for them?

Mr. COUZENS. There is no denying it, but that has nothing to do with what we are discussing. I am discussing capital for investment.

Mr. LOGAN. How does the Senator know the banks have plenty of money? Where does he get the information?

Mr. COUZENS. From the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. LOGAN. And they get it from the reports of the banks, do they not?

Mr. COUZENS. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator know whether the banks have the credits which they report, that the securities which they hold are worth the amount at which they are carried on their books?

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no; those are two different things. I am contending that the records show there is plenty of cash, plenty to loan for industry. I am not talking about what their investments are worth. That is an entirely different thing.

Mr. LOGAN. How much cash is in the banks at this time?

Mr. COUZENS. I could not give the exact figures, but there are hundreds of millions of dollars that they will not loan.

Mr. LOGAN. There is less than $1,000,000,000 of cash in the banks, is there not?

Mr. COUZENS. But the people can not get it out, no matter what it is, because the banks are afraid to loan it except to concerns that made a very high-class showing of earnings and are still earning some money.

Mr. LOGAN. That goes back to what the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] said, that the chief trouble is fear on the part of the banks that they would lose money if they loaned it. Is that the conclusion of the Senator?

Mr. COUZENS. I think that is the understanding, but why should not a bank hesitate before it loans other people's money to a concern which has not any demand for its products?

Mr. LOGAN. Is it not also true that if we sell bonds to obtain productive capital, as suggested by the Senator from Montana, that the amount of income tax the concern will have to pay will affect very much the price at which the bonds can be sold to the public? The higher the rate of income tax, of course, the lower would be the dividends or interest to the investing public. That certainly would be true, would it not?

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator mean the higher the rates of income tax the more industry has to pay for its capital?

Mr. LOGAN. That is what I mean.

Mr. COUZENS. Undoubtedly; that is correct.

Mr. LOGAN. And that would reduce the amount of available capital for productive enterprises. If an enterprise had to pay a higher rate of interest, it would obtain less money.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; but there is already too much money for capital in industry now. In other words, productive facilities are now greatly in excess of the needs of industry, and that was true even during the so-called prosperous years of 1928 and 1929.

Mr. LOGAN. Is it not true that many of the plants of manufacturing concerns, for instance, have deteriorated, that the organization has gone to pieces during the lean years, and that it will require a vast amount of money to recondition and rehabilitate them? Is not that true?

Mr. COUZENS. Oh no; I do not think there is the slightest foundation for that, because if a business is at all well run, if a factory is at all well run, the management always keep up maintenance, keep their machinery oiled, their fire-fighting facilities in order, and keep up the plants. Of course, as we go on, if the depression should go on year after year, the obsolescence would increase really more than the depreciation would increase.

Mr. LOGAN. The obsolescence is going on, is it not?

Mr. COUZENS. I think that is true, so I am not at all concerned about taking a portion of the present income to tide it over at least during present conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. If I remember correctly $55,000,000,000 was the high point of deposits in the banks of the United States. The last report issued showed that the amount had shrunk to $46,000,000,000, so there is $9,000,000,000 that has gone somewhere. It is either invested in securities and drawn from the banks, or it has been used for some other purpose, building, and so forth. That is all the difference there is between the high point and the point of deposits to-day, $9,000,000,000.

Mr. COUZENS. I know there are bankers by the dozen who would be delighted to have many of the corporations, now running at 25 to 50 per cent capacity borrow money. There has been a change brought about by the excess-profits tax, by the high income-tax rates and other economic changes since the war, which have persuaded the great industries in many cases to pay less dividends and conserve their cash, so that many industries which used to be great and extensive borrowers from banks are not now borrowers at all. The great commercial banks would be delighted to have an opportunity to loan those industries which are now well financed and running at 25 to 50 per cent capacity.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Apropos of the colloquy which took place between the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Utah a while ago, I have here a clipping from the Washington Evening Star of March 25, containing a dispatch from New York from which I would like to read, with the Senator's permission.

Mr. COUZENS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I read:

NEW YORK, March 25.—There is still a considerable body of American corporations able to show a satisfactory earning capacity during a period of depression. As the complete figures of results for 1931 are prepared and made available for public review, it becomes apparent that in many industrial and public-utility companies there is an astonishing vitality and a prospect for maintenance for some time to come of present dividend payments.

One list that has just been prepared by a prominent banking house includes 85 corporations which showed a higher net revenue last year than in 1930. The total net of these companies in 1931 was approximately $330,000,000, compared with slightly less than $300,000,000 in the year previous. It included about 30 whose shares are listed on the New York Stock Exchange and are actively dealt in from day to day.

I dare say these were the corporations referred to by the Senator, whose rates remain exactly the same as they were in 1929 and 1930 and whose expenses have diminished since that time.

The article continues:

UTILITIES EARNINGS FAIRLY STEADY

The significant feature of this analysis is the gain in net earnings per share over that in what would now be called the fairly prosperous year of 1930. The average net per share of the 85 companies last year was 6.75 per cent. In 1930 it was 5.95 per cent.

There were 10 companies showing earnings on their stocks last year that were not able to reveal any profit remaining to the credit of their stock in the preceding year. An additional gain should be credited to the fact that in a number of instances there were more shares of specific concerns outstanding in 1931 than in 1930, so the comparison is even more favorable than it appears at first glance. In the list there is only one conspicuous railroad which enjoyed more prosperity last year than in 1930. In general it may be said that the best exhibit was by the power and light and telephone companies.

I ask that the remainder of the article may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The remainder of the article is as follows:

The review supplements figures revealed earlier in the month by a prominent bank covering the net worth of 900 industrial corporations at the end of 1931. This was based on returns from practically all kinds of manufacturing and distributing organizations, including those that had suffered a severe reaction in their earnings and others that had benefited by the shifting directions of trade. Their total net worth was approximately $18,000,000,000. The remarkable fact was that the net worth of these 900 concerns at the end of last December was only one-half of 1 per cent below that of the same period in 1930.

Many comparisons have been made between conditions in 1921 and in 1931. Some are favorable; others have a reverse trend. In general, however, the statistics indicate the more substantial character of corporation finances to-day than at the height of the last previous panic, and are highly encouraging. The main differences between the two periods in the balance sheets of corporations are in the reduced bonded debt, smaller bank loans, lower inventories, and a much higher proportion of cash and marketable securities in current assets than at any other time in American corporation history. This is reflected in the tenacity with which numerous companies have held to a dividend policy, despite the fact that their earnings have been dropping off month by month for nearly two years.

NET WORKING CAPITAL

A third compilation that has just been published by a New York Stock Exchange firm indicates the contrast in the net working capital of over 30 corporations whose shares are listed on the "big board." A few of them are worth noting. Bethlehem Steel, for instance, at the close of 1931 had a net working capital in excess of $116,000,000, against less than $88,000,000, 10 years previous. General Electric showed $190,000,000, against $151,000,000; General Motors, nearly $319,000,000, compared with less than $96,000,000; International Harvester about $225,000,000, compared with $153,000,000; Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co., $151,000,000, against less than $57,000,000; and Montgomery Ward about $95,000,000, against less than $15,000,000. Woolworth had nearly $53,000,000, against $30,000,000, more than 10 years previous.

Mr. COUZENS. What the Senator has read is in elaboration of what I tried to state a while ago, that it is perfectly absurd to say that we have not any income in the country now, that all income is wiped out, that there are no revenues to be obtained for the Government from income. Such an assertion is either due to ignorance or is made with deliberate intention to mislead.

For example, I have here a statement entitled "Standard Trade and Securities," dated May 11, 1932, day before yesterday, in which are shown the composite income accounts and balance sheet of leading American industrial corporations, 313 of them, on which comparable data are available. I am going to mention the figures only as they appear with relation to current assets. I am not going into capital or fixed assets or anything but current assets.

Taking the number of industries to which I have just referred, which are mentioned in this sheet, the statement shows cash and equivalent in 1929, $2,343,000,000; in 1930, $2,267,000,000; and in 1931, $2,249,000,000. In other words, using 100 as the 1929 basis—in 1929, of course, it was 100—in 1930 it was 97, and in 1931 it was 96, showing how little the variation was in the current cash account.

Then let us take the receivables, which are another quick asset. The receivables in 1929 were $1,782,000,000; in 1930 $1,517,000,000; and in 1931, $1,250,000,000. In other words, the relation of 1930 to 1929 was as 85 to 100, and the relation of 1931 to 1929 was as 70 to 100, showing that even the receivables were being reduced by payment of debts.

While the inventories were substantially reduced, it is the obvious result of decreased production and purchasing. For instance, the relation of 1931 to 1929 inventories, assuming 110 for 1929, shows 75 in 1931 and 90 in 1930.

So, Mr. President, it is not conceivable that anybody can seriously entertain the idea that there is not plenty of income to tax and that it may not be taxed without any burden upon anyone so far as the necessities of life are concerned or so far as the constructive needs of the Nation are concerned. I contend that from this schedule we can raise an additional $400,000,000, that we can take that much more out of the 1932 incomes than the existing rates would provide, and that we can do it without injuring anyone, without injuring productivity, without taxing the poor, and without imposing any consumption tax.

Of course there will be two or three or four million people out of 122,000,000 who will holler like stuck pigs, but they will not be hurt. I contend it is much better to increase the revenue in that way than to try to extract $200,000,000 from people who have to live in a very modest way if not in a really inadequate manner.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask if any other Senator desires to address the Senate this evening?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] had expected to speak.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Massachusetts told me that he desired to proceed this evening, but he is at present out of the Chamber, and I do not know whether or not he spoke to the Senator from Mississippi as to his intentions.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts entered the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. I see the Senator from Massachusetts is now present.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the speech of the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] is based upon the theory that we shall depart from all previous programs of levying taxes to raise the revenue necessary to meet the expenditures of the Government. If we are to adopt the policy of meeting the expenditures of the Government by taxes levied upon personal net incomes, upon profits of corporations, and upon gifts and estates taxes, we ought to accept the pending proposition. If we are to limit the taxing field to individual incomes, incomes of corporations, gifts, and estates taxes, the Senator from Michigan has presented an impressive case for the rate schedule he advocates. However, in the tax bill framed in the other House, approved in principle by the Finance Committee and in principle similar to all previous tax bills, we have divided the field of revenue into three parts: First, income taxes, corporation taxes, gift taxes, and estate taxes; the second group, a limited number of manufacturers' sales taxes, excise taxes—whatever name one chooses to call them; third, miscellaneous taxes, such as taxes on theater, athletic, and race-track admissions, and, as in this bill, taxes on telephone and telegraph messages, check tax, and stamp taxes of various kinds, which are frequently called nuisance taxes.

I repeat, if we are to depart from the method we have followed in the past and are to wipe out all special sales and nuisance taxes, admission taxes, and stamp taxes, we should vote for the proposition of the Senator from Michigan; but before we do that, let us consider what we are doing and analyze the high rates proposed in order to learn where the sweeping increases in taxes are to be levied. Let us see who of the income-tax payers of the Nation are to be burdened by rates that were never before exacted except during the hectic days of the World War. If the Congress pursues the course it has followed in the past of putting the major portion rather than the entire tax burden upon the personal incomes of our citizens, upon corporations, upon estates and gifts, then we must consider what miscellaneous taxes and what sales taxes we should incorporate in the bill in order to make up the deficiency.

In the bill which the House sent to the Senate and in the bill as reported by the Finance Committee there are a large number of sales taxes—taxes on sales of automobiles, tires, tubes, candy, athletic goods, gum, furs, soft drinks, and so forth—so-called miscellaneous taxes, including admissions and stamp taxes.

When the proper time comes—and not until that period of the debate arrives—instead of picking out certain definite particular industries the products of which this bill proposes to levy a high sales tax, and thereby saying to a few industries like the automobile industry, "You shall pay a sales tax of from 4 to 10 per cent," or instead of saying to the child who goes to a moving-picture theater, "You shall pay a tax of 10 per cent upon admission charges in excess of 10 cents," I propose, if we are going to enter into that taxation field, that we treat all industries alike and put a small sales tax upon all of them, with certain exemptions for food and clothing and farm implements—a minimum tax of 1½ per cent or 1 per cent. However, that is not the purpose for which I arose at this time. I desire to discuss the rates in the pending proposal dealing with the net incomes of individuals. The subject of choosing between the two different sales-tax plans, both of which are undesirable, can be discussed later. The bill as it comes to us has the various classified sources for producing revenue to which I have referred.

I will confine my observations now to the proposal made by the Senator from Michigan. It has much merit; but to my mind there is one very serious objection to it, namely, that at one fell swoop it increases by a very high percentage the taxes on the large middle class of taxpayers. Let me recall the present normal-tax rates to the Senate. Under the present law the normal-tax rates are embraced in three brackets which are as follows: 1½ per cent on the first $4,000 of net income in excess of the credits allowed; 3 per cent on the next $4,000; and 5 per cent on the remainder. Keep those rates in mind—1½ per cent, 3 per cent, and 5 per cent. The House retained the same brackets, but made the rates recommended by the Treasury, 2 per cent, 4 per cent, and 7 per cent; increasing the 1½ per cent to 2 per cent, the 3 per cent to 4 per cent, and the 5 per cent to 7 per cent. The proposal of the Senator from Michigan is to make two brackets instead of three and to make the man whose normal-tax rate now is 1½ per cent pay 6 per cent, and to increase the tax rate of a taxpayer whose rate is now 3 per cent or 5 per cent to 12 per cent. A further objection to this proposal is that it wipes out the credits since 1924 extended to earned incomes. This will result in a 33⅓ per cent increase in the tax bill of those who heretofore have had the benefit of the deduction from earned incomes.

Mr. President, the class of taxpayers who must bear this tremendous tax-rate increase is a very large one. Is the large amount of revenue which the Senator from Michigan expects to raise in place of nuisance and admission taxes coming from the multimillionaires? No. It is coming from the increased thousands who will be brought into the tax-paying field by lowering the exemptions of the married man and the single man and by increasing very substantially the normal tax he will have to pay. There is where the money is going to come from under the proposal of the Senator from Michigan. It is not going to come from the few who will fall under the high brackets but from the hundreds of thousands who have incomes of $3,000, $4,000, $5,000, and $6,000. Is this not "soaking" the great middle class?

Let me quote from a prepared table.

HERE IS THE TAX SENATE COMMITTEE AND COUZENS PLAN PROPOSE TO LEVY ON INCOMES

Persons with net incomes of $5,000 will pay more than three times their present tax under rates just agreed to by the Senate Finance Committee. Under the Couzens plan nearly twelve times more.

Under the same Couzens rates persons with $100,000 net will pay a little more than twice their present tax. Those with $1,000,000 net will also pay less than three times as much as now.

The following table, compiled by a Capitol tax expert, shows the individual income taxes levied on various net incomes under the present law, the House bill, and the Senate bill. The taxes computed are for married persons with no dependents, and possessing the maximum amount of earned income allowance. Their present flat $3,500 exemption is reduced to $2,500 in both bills. The table follows:

Net income	Present law	House bill	Senate bill	Couzens proposal
$3,000	0	$2.50	$3.75	$60
$4,000	$5.63	20.00	30.00
$5,000	16.88	37.50	56.25	180
$6,000	28.13	55.00	82.50
$10,000	101.25	210.00	295.00	830
$20,000	618.75	1,160.00	1,440.00	2,630
$50,000	4,588.75	7,160.00	8,040.00	11,030
$100,000	15,768.75	26,560.00	28,440.00	35,030
$500,000	115,768.75	214,560.00	230,440.00	323,030
$1,000,000	240,768.75	449,560.00	492,940.00	703,030

Do we realize, Mr. President, that, under the proposal of the Senator from Michigan, the tax paid by a citizen with an income of $5,000 is increased twelve times? An income of $10,000 is increased eight times? No multimillionaire's tax is increased twelve times or eight times or anywhere near it. Put briefly, it is a proposal to increase the revenue from income taxes through very sharp increases in the normal taxes of the great middle class.

Now, let us see who compose that class. Who are they? In this city or any other city they are the men or women with net incomes of $4,000. They are the owners of homes worth five or ten or fifteen thousand dollars. They have put their savings into their homes; their homes have been their bank. They are professional men perhaps, or men and women who have small incomes from investments which may have been made—incomes of four thousand, five thousand, or six thousand dollars.

The men and women in this class more than any other taxpayers have been feeling the burden of increased taxation because they have been compelled to meet increased real estate and other taxes in their respective municipalities, because it is from real estate that most of the municipal revenues are derived. They have had their taxes very materially increased because of the increase in local expenditures and in many cases because of increases in welfare demands, and their State taxes have also been largely increased.

It is the class that pay income taxes also in the several States that levy State income taxes; indeed, the class that is spending substantial sums from their income to educate their children, for such expenditures are not exempt.

Much has been said about it being irritating to those of very great wealth to have their taxes increased by the proposal made by the Senator from Michigan. What kind of irritation will it cause to the millions of people with families to support, homes to pay for, and children to educate, having income of four thousand or five or six thousand dollars, to have us vote to levy upon them an increase of six, eight, ten, and twelve times their present Federal tax through the medium of the pending bill? State and municipal taxes have jumped in recent years, but the Federal Government will outdistance all these increases and take the prize if these proposed rates are adopted.

Let me give the Senate some figures. Under the present law a citizen with a $5,000 net income pays taxes of $16.88. The House bill makes the tax $37.50. The proposal of the Senator from Michigan makes that tax $180—an increase from $16.88 to $180. The Senator from Michigan says that is not much of an increase. The citizen with an income of $3,000 pays nothing to-day, but under this proposal he will pay $60. If the income is $10,000, the tax jumps from $101.25 to $830. On the basis of percentage, however, and if we are to consider irritation of taxpayers, I submit that that man or woman, with his or her little home worth five, ten, or fifteen thousand dollars, with that limited net income, is going to feel very much irritated and very much disturbed. Is it to be wondered at that the small income received is to-day more tax-minded than ever before? It is from him, not the so-called rich, that the new taxes are to be extracted.

In the Committee on Finance I moved an increase from the normal rates over the House rates, but I refused to go to the extreme proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]. I said I could not justify in one fell swoop, in the midst of this awful depression, issuing notice upon this class of taxpayers that their taxes had been increase eight and twelve times over their present taxes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I gladly yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. The man who has an income of $5,000 a year, and who would have to pay out $180 in income taxes under this proposal, is not hurt, is he?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not think he is; but I do say that with the additional amount he is obliged to pay because of the increase in municipal taxes, and the additional amount he is obliged to pay because of the increase in State taxes, this increased Federal income tax will not make him very contented, but it will cause him to feel that at a time when he is feeling deeply the depression that exists throughout the land his Government is not very considerate of him.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. Does not the Senator think that 95 per cent of the American people to-day would be glad to place themselves in the category where they had an income of $5,000 and had to pay only $180 in income taxes?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly a large number of our people who have no incomes at all, or very small incomes, would be delighted and happy to have incomes of $5,000, and probably would be glad to pay the tax if that could be brought about; but we are dealing not with theories but with realities, and we are dealing with a class of people who have been paying a tax of $16 on the basis of an income of $5,000. Their taxes will be raised under this proposal to the amount of $180, which it is urged is inconsequential and trivial; and yet, based upon a consideration of what one's tax bill was and what one's tax bill is to be, it is 12 times the present amount. It will be a most unwelcome demand and we should not jump the rate to such an extreme point at this time.

The proposal which was made by me and adopted by the Finance Committee was to increase the normal tax in the first bracket, fixed by the House at 2 per cent, to 3 per cent—not 6 per cent, as proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]; to increase the normal tax in the second bracket, fixed by the House at 4 per cent, to 6 per cent; and to increase the normal tax in the third bracket, fixed by the House at 7 per cent, to 9 per cent. The rates proposed by me were 3, 6, and 9, as against the House rates of 2, 4, and 7 and the proposal of the Senator from Michigan of 6 and 12 per cent.

Under the circumstances that exist in this country, with our people groaning under the awful burdens of exceedingly crushing taxation, with our people tax disturbed as never before, with the worries that the people who have saved a few dollars are encountering and will encounter, it seems to me that this increase proposed by the Senate Finance Committee is about all we ought to impose now.

No one knows what we may be called upon to levy next year; but I think that in the first tax bill we have had to draft since the depression came the rates in the amendment are extreme at this particular time and under these particular circumstances. Let us not increase the gloom and discontent that surround us by such a precipitous act as the adoption of this proposal.

Therefore it seems to me that the recommendation of the Finance Committee—higher than the House rates, much higher than the rates of the present law, in every particular higher than those, but far less, particularly so far as the normal tax is concerned, than the proposals of the Senator from Michigan—under all the circumstances is a reasonable proposal and that it will give more general satisfaction and less disheartenment to our taxpayers.

Let me add that when announcement was made of the increases by the Senate committee from 2 to 3 per cent and from 4 to 6 per cent and from 7 to 9 per cent there was a loud protest throughout this country. It was thought that we were going too far; and yet it is proposed here that we shall make the rate 6 and 12 per cent. I can not go that far. I may have to accept it in the near future; but at the present time it seems to me that the rates recommended by the Finance Committee are reasonable and fair.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I am pleased, indeed, to know that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has reported out a farm bill which will be upon the calendar, I assume, to-morrow, so that we will at least have one measure before the Senate, and before Congress for that matter—because there is no such measure on the Calendar of the House—ready for consideration. I want to assure the chairman of the committee that this action will be most highly appreciated by the agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. President, about 40 miles westward from Omaha, a primary grain market, is Fremont. It is in one of the richest sections of Nebraska. Here is a letter from a conservative citizen of Fremont, in which he states that on the day of writing—May 11—the following prices were prevailing in that city:

Wheat, 40 cents a bushel. Prior to 1915, in March of each year for the five previous years, the price of wheat averaged 88.9 cents a bushel.

Corn, 27 cents a bushel. For the five-year period of 1909–1914, in March, the average price of corn was 61.3 cents—more than twice the price that was being received at Fremont on the day this letter was written.

Oats, 23 cents a bushel. For the month of March, during the 5-year period to which I have referred, oats were 40.3 cents a bushel, as an average.

Eggs, 9 cents per dozen.

Hogs, $2.10 per hundred. Mr. President, the average price of hogs for the five years preceding 1915 was $7.24 per hundred, or more than three times the price being paid May 11 in Fremont.

Continuing, this correspondent says:

> Now, if the farmer gets 20 bushels of wheat per acre, it would make him $8 per acre with a cost to produce same of at least $10 per acre. For his oats, 23 cents per bushel, with a 30-bushel yield, gives him $6.90, costing at least $9 per acre to produce, and so on down the list. Hogs, $2.10—just think how much interest, and from $1 to $2 per acre taxes, the farmer can pay on these prices.
> Every time he turns around he is losing money. One of our good farmers living around 4 miles east in this good country came to Fremont to-day to borrow $6,000 on a 200-acre farm and could not get it, when he should be able to borrow at least $10,000 on most favorable terms.
> I am just stating to you that if this market keeps up another year, labor can not be employed, merchants can not sell, and everyone will be broke or busted.

Mr. President, I just came from a meeting of the subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee, before whom was testifying Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale, and he stated that the country to-day is—using a nautical term—"in irons." When a sailing vessel comes about, it may hesitate; it may not catch the wind on the other side of its sails, and one can not tell which way it is going. Professor Fisher says that is the situation to-day in this country, and unless prices become better we may have a most serious decline, and no one knows where it might end.

But to continue with this letter:

Why does not Congress do something to ease up this situation? The bears have us and they are digging in their claws, and when they touch the vital spot, then we had all better look out. You can tell the Senate, the people will stand about so much and they will then call a halt.

Better get things fixed up while the people are still in no worse humor, for Washington is the place of fixing things, they have the power and are elected on platforms to do so, but when will they start? We are hoping for the best.

Mr. President, the attitude of the farmer respecting the depression is tending toward a culmination point. The depression has not merely been recent for agriculture. It began in 1921. That year agriculture's relative buying power dropped 25 per cent below equality. During the 11 years terminating with 1931, the decrease in agriculture's relative buying power constituted a 16½ per cent differential against the farmer. Translating this statement into dollars and cents, we find that during that period the total farm income was $19,125,000,000 less than that which would have constituted equality with other industries, or an average of about $1,740,000,000 per annum for the 11 years.

This $1,740,000,000 is the annual amount of the Nation's income, which the farmer should have received but which, because of the tariff and price fixing, legal and illegal, did not reach him, but went into the pockets of others. Had the farmer not been thus mulcted, he would not be here demanding that the distribution of annual income of the country should be changed directly or indirectly by law for his benefit. He is here because of what Congress and others have done and are doing to his disadvantage. He is here pleading merely for equal treatment.

Had he received during the last 11 years, as an annual average, this $1,740,000,000, taken from him unjustly and given to others, he would not have had trouble paying his taxes, because the total of his taxes has averaged about $1,000,000,000 a year. Nor would he have had trouble paying his farm mortgage interest, in addition to paying his taxes, because such interest charges, which he has had to meet, are about $640,000,000 annually. Subtracting these two items from this $1,740,000,000, there remains an annual average of $100,000,000, which he could have used for amortization or other purposes.

But, Mr. President, this differential against the farmer was not 16½ per cent in 1931, but 38 per cent. In short, last year $3,615,000,000 were diverted, not into the farmers' pockets, but unjustly into the pockets of others in this country. The result was a tragedy for agriculture, constituting a situation that should appeal not only to our sense of justice, but to our sympathies.

For more than 5½ months Congress has been in session, but no constructive action to prevent a repetition of such a catastrophy in the future has been taken by either House. True, we have done a little in the way of providing funds and free wheat for the destitute, but that is practically all.

Mr. President, we must apply ourselves to agricultural legislation. This country can not regain its former condition of prosperity with the farmer at the disadvantage which he is suffering to-day, and has suffered for the last 11 years. Something must be done.

Mr. President, are we going to act? We are endeavoring to balance the Budget, but, as important as that is, the rescue of agriculture is of far greater importance, because we will not have to worry about balancing the Budget if agriculture is placed in a position of equality with other industries in this country.

Mr. President, agriculture must be rescued.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the able and indefatigable junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is rising in his place each day in a very notable and consecutive effort to remind the Senate of its paramount obligations to agriculture. In this serial habit he is somewhat reminiscent of famous Cato of old in the Roman Senate and his continuous practice of paying his respects to Carthage.

The Senator pertinently reminds us that there has not been until to-day a single constructive proposal upon the calendar of either House or Senate for the benefit of agriculture. I remind him, however, that there is at least one imminent proposal upon the calendar which aims squarely against agriculture, in that it contemplates a specific discriminatory tax against that which has now become a major and indispensable agricultural implement, namely, the motor vehicle. This bill is now before the Senate. So I suggest to the Senator that in mobilizing ourselves in behalf and defense of agriculture we be interested not only in the affirmative program to which the Senator so persistently addresses himself, but that we be equally interested in a sturdy defense of agriculture against these intended inimical invasions of its already depleted pocketbook. Here is something we can do for agriculture at once.

I send to the desk and ask to have read a letter which I have received from the Washington representative of a highly important branch of organized agriculture, and I commend it to those in the Senate who pretend to be the friends of agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 12, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
Senate Office Building.

MY DEAR SENATOR VANDENBERG: Speaking for organized agriculture in the United States, we desire to notify you in this direct and unreserved manner that the farmers of this country are unalterably and unequivocally opposed to any special taxes upon automobiles, trucks, and parts in the pending revenue bill.

Any such special tax is a direct and discriminatory levy upon agriculture. Motor vehicles to-day are indispensable farm implements. They are an integral part of farm equipment. They are an unavoidable necessity of farm life. To single them out for special levy, practically alone among the commodities, is to choose agriculture as a special tax victim at a time when agriculture has a right to expect at least equitable consideration.

We protest this section of the pending tax bill and urge those who sympathize with agriculture to join in its defeat.

Very respectfully,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
CHESTER H. GRAY,
Washington Representative.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, this is the uniform expression of the united attitude of organized agriculture and its spokesmanship respecting this contemplated tax upon motor vehicles in the pending revenue bill. Agriculture feels as keenly about this matter as it does about any phase of our responsibility to it. It resents being victimized by special discriminatory taxes. This is but one of many reasons against the proposed motor levies.

I send to the desk another letter bespeaking the attitude of the National Grange, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD. It carries a straight message to those Senators who wish to prove that they are farm-minded. I shall present this whole proposition in all its implications to labor and related industry when this section of the bill is reached next week. At the moment I am content to emphasize the agricultural phase in supplement to the daily appeal by my distinguished colleague.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
Washington, D. C., May 13, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The National Grange is in favor of the commendable efforts which are being made to balance the Federal Budget. However, we are strongly against the proposed Federal taxes on automobiles, trucks, and accessories contained in the pending revenue bill.

In our opinion this is a field of taxation which is already well exploited and which should be left to the States. State taxes on gasoline in 1931 amounted to $524,000,000; license fees totaled $348,000,000, while personal property and municipal taxes on motor vehicles took $150,000,000. This makes a total of $1,022,000,000, or about one-tenth of all taxes paid in the United States, Federal, State, and local. We have expended billions of dollars in building improved highways, and it would be unwise to adopt a policy of taxation that would tend to make it prohibitive to use these highways.

About one-fifth of all the automobiles and trucks in the country are on the farms of the United States. The trucks on our farms alone number more than 900,000. They form a part of the farmer's necessary equipment. They are no more luxuries than freight cars and locomotives are luxuries, yet no one would think of placing a special tax on freight cars and locomotives. In round figures, we have been expending about one billion for highways during recent years. As I have already indicated, special taxes on automobiles reach about the same figure. This shows that there is no truth in the argument that the owners of motor vehicles are not contributing their just share toward the upkeep of our highways.

The proposed levies on motor vehicles contained in the new revenue bill are unjust and highly discriminatory. We are unalterably opposed to the imposition of these proposed taxes.

Yours sincerely,

FRED BRENCKMAN,
Washington Representative.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I want to say to the able Senator from Michigan that the reason why he is here on the floor now pleading the cause of the automobile industry is because the pleas of agriculture for equality during the last 11 years have not been heeded. Notwithstanding the differential that has persisted against agriculture during all those years, the automotive industry flourished, but finally, when a 38 per cent differential developed against agriculture, then the automotive industry felt the blow, as all have also felt the blow throughout the country.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in executive session, laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received see the end of Senate proceedings.)

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will take a recess to-day until 11 o'clock to-morrow, and I give notice now that beginning on Monday I shall ask that the Senate meet at 11 o'clock and hold night sessions.

Mr. WHEELER. I object.

Mr. SMOOT. I give the notice.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am sure that everyone wants to expedite the consideration of the pending measure as fast as possible. I am not going to ask for it now, but I hope that to-morrow the Senator from Utah will try to get some agreement with reference to debate on the pending amendment and other amendments pertaining to the income and surtax sections, because if we do not expedite along those lines and agree to limit ourselves to less than two or three hour speeches we shall be here indefinitely.

RECESS

Mr. MCNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, May 14, 1932, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 13 (legislative day of May 9), 1932

SECRETARY IN THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE

Morris N. Hughes, of Illinois, now a Foreign Service officer, unclassified, and a vice consul of career, to be also a secretary in the Diplomatic Service of the United States of America.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY

Anthony Savage, of Washington, to be United States attorney, western district of Washington. He is now serving in this position under an appointment which expires May 29, 1932.

PROMOTIONS IN THE REGULAR ARMY

MEDICAL CORPS

To be lieutenant colonels

Maj. Thomas Ewing Scott, Medical Corps, from May 5, 1932.

Maj. Thomas Everett Harwood, jr., Medical Corps, from May 9, 1932.

Maj. Philip Barry Connolly, Medical Corps, from May 10, 1932.

Maj. Samuel Jay Turnbull, Medical Corps, from May 11, 1932.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MAY 13, 1932

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Eternal God, our words falter as the shadows of the Nation's sorrow fall and deepen. Yonder home to-day is a world shrine, at whose footstool we tarry. The night winds of sorrow murmur as tears fall and sink on the curls of gold matted and damp. Merciful Father, may the parents be fed no longer with the bread of affliction; do Thou give them rest which the world can nevermore defile. Consider and hear us, O Lord. Ours is national humiliation as we vision the depths of this infamy. Arouse the public conscience that a slight atonement may be made, by smiting murderers and outlaws into the dust. Cleanse the arteries of our whole country, where breed and swarm the filth and crime of our national household. Almighty God, lift us up, let us see, lead us on; hear us, for Thy mercy's sake. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, May 11, 1932, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 27) providing for the correction of an error in the enrollment of Senate bill 3584 relating to insurance corporations in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 4576. An act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to grant an easement for railroad right of way over and upon a portion of the helium gas bearing lands of the United States of America, in Potter County, in the State of Texas; and

S. 4581. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6477) entitled "An act to further extend naturalization privileges to alien veterans of the World War residing in the United States," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. KING to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. METCALF and Mr. COPELAND members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of Labor.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on May 13, 1932, the President approved and signed bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 8637. An act to authorize the sale, on competitive bids, of unallotted lands on the Lac du Flambeau Indian Reservation, in Wisconsin, not needed for allotment, tribal, or administrative purposes;

H. R. 9591. An act to extend the period of time during which final proof may be offered by homestead entrymen; and

H. R. 10277. An act to transfer Lincoln County from the Columbia division to the Winchester division of the middle Tennessee judicial district.

PROPAGANDA

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in view of the fact that I think it is generally desired to proceed with the War Department appropriation bill, I shall not object in this instance, but if any other requests are made I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say it is very important to dispose of the War Department appropriation bill. I shall not object to the request of the gentleman from New York, but if these requests become too numerous or consume too much time, I shall be constrained to make objection myself. I think we should get along with this bill and defer remarks until after the bill has been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the Members the propaganda that is now being conducted by big business throughout the country. Eight or nine days ago President Hoover sent a message to the House criticizing them for not balancing the Budget. Since that time I have received thousands of letters from my district asking me to go along with the President and balance the Budget.

I have made it a practice to answer all letters received, but during the last three or four days I received an average of five or six hundred a day, and I discovered that they contained about the same language.

Yesterday I received a letter with a copy of the Yonkers Record, a daily paper, exposing the method used by the officials of the Otis factory. I hold here in my hand a copy of the Younkers Record of May 10, which you all can see:

Otis factory workers directed to demand action by Congress on Budget and economy. Form letters are given out to be signed. Robert H. Goodwillie makes plea to employees in all departments. Criticism by Hoover of legislators is repeated. Remarks taken to indicate that big business is still behind President.

This paper shows that the employees of the Otis factory were compelled to sign the letters that the company itself prepared and paid for, to be sent to the Representatives in Congress asking them to support President Hoover in his economy plan. If ever there was an attempt to destroy representative government in this country, it is taking place at the present time by big business.

I have heard great speeches made on the floor of the House about communists' activities in this country, but let me say to the Members of the House that the action of the officials of the Otis elevator factory in Yonkers will create more communists in one week than all the communist agitators would create in 10 years.

I want to say this to the Economy Committee: That this whole agitation to balance the Budget by reducing salaries and lowering the standard of living in our country is brought about by big business, and that is why we are getting letters from our constituents, because if they fail to write them they will lose their positions. What a serious condition confronts our country when citizens are compelled to do things against their will. I believe it is the duty of President Hoover to repudiate the actions of the Otis Elevator Co. officials if he believes in representative government. [Applause.]

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I yield.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Has the gentleman seen these red cards? The stock brokers are paying $3.60 per hundred to send those out.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am not informed as to that.

THE BECK-LINTHICUM RESOLUTIONS

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some remarks of my own in regard to Resolution 209.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, the Beck and the Linthicum resolutions are practically identical in wording, as follows:

That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States when ratified by conventions chosen for that purpose in the several States under the provisions of Article V of the Constitution:

Article XVIII of the Constitution is hereby amended so as to read:

"The Congress shall have power to regulate or to prohibit the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, and the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes: Provided, however, That such power shall not be construed or applied to abridge or deny the right of any State to authorize and regulate the manufacture, sale, transportation, or use of such intoxicating liquors wholly within the borders of such State; and such power of regulation or any power of the Congress to regulate interstate and foreign commerce shall not be construed to empower the Congress to authorize the shipment, transportation, or importation into any State of intoxicating liquors for beverage or other purposes, whenever the manufacture, sale, transportation, or use of such liquors has been prohibited by the laws of such State; and any such shipment or importation of intoxicating liquors into such State in violation of its laws is prohibited, and any such shipment or importation shall be subject to the laws of the State upon its arrival therein."

The resolution is set forth that it may be seen just what was proposed.

It has been claimed by newspapers and in propaganda that it provided for a resubmission of the eighteenth amendment with an opportunity to vote on the question, in spite of the fact that no way is now provided for a direct vote. A reading of the resolution will disclose that no attempt was made to secure a vote except through the roundabout controlled-convention system, and that if adopted it would operate to prevent a direct vote for a long time to come and at a period when an increasing number of American citizens are demanding that right.

As a matter of fact the resolution offers only a new eighteenth amendment to go into effect when ratified by conventions and not by votes of the people. Conventions, at their best, seldom follow the will of the voters. They provide machinery for the control of the many by the few. The members are elected and their action is dictated by party bosses and well-financed minorities. The results of constitutional conventions have been disappointing.

The convention system of amending the State constitution was discarded in Vermont more than 60 years ago and the direct-vote plan was substituted.

Another defect is that there is no guaranty against the open saloon so plainly denounced by Mr. LINTHICUM, one of the authors.

The resolutions did not even have the approval of some of the ablest of the opponents of prohibition. One of them, an able lawyer, has pointed out in a document recently made public that the wording of a constitutional amendment is of supreme importance, and then calls attention to the fact that as a whole the resolution leaves with Congress the power to "regulate or to prohibit" liquor traffic and at the same time gives power to each State to "authorize and regulate" such traffic. Authority is divided in an uncertain manner. This division of power would put the question into politics forever.

If under the proposal Congress should assert its right to "regulate and prohibit," we would be in a worse position than now, because all the evils of Federal enforcement would still remain and be mutiplied by a number equal to the number of dry State borders to be guarded. Stated in the language of this able critic of the eighteenth amendment, the situation would be "confused and bedeviled by the division of power, duty, and responsibility."

Another undesirable situation would be created, for as it is pointed out by this same leader the resolution would by constitutional sanction permit a return of one of the evils of the old order, namely, the flooding of States that preferred to remain dry with shipments of liquor from wet States. The resolution is not even in accord with the views of able men who demand resubmission or modification.

These confusions and shortcomings arise, no doubt, from the fact that the members of the committee drafting the resolutions took the language of recommendation No. 11 of the Wickersham report, added to it a portion of the Raskob proposal, and then embodied the Guthrie suggestion, with certain important omissions, and brought out a production unsatisfactory to many wets and opposed by the drys.

Its adoption would serve to block any direct vote in the near future, leave open the door to all the abuses of the old system, provide an unworkable division of control, result in doubling the cost of enforcement and adding to the tax burdens, permit the continued operations of racketeers and bootleggers, and make necessary an army of enforcement officers. The resolution offered the most unsatisfactory solution of a serious problem that has yet come before the House.

I shall vote against any major proposal dealing with the liquor problem that does not in some way bring about a direct vote by the people of the States in the same manner that amendments to the Constitution of my State are approved. The Federal Constitution should require all its amendments to be so ratified.

I have been on record for 30 years in favor of a full measure of direct control by the people through their votes. I have complete confidence that the voters of Vermont are capable of solving every question submitted to them. They have never failed.

THE LINDBERGH TRAGEDY

Mr. EATON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. EATON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I have refrained from any public reference to the Lindbergh tragedy owing to the fact that the family is resident in my home district, and I did not wish to appear even remotely to attach my name to the publicity evoked by the case. I think this House to-day would desire to have some one express the profound feeling of sympathy for this young couple that is stirring every heart here and also to give expression to the question that must agitate every man who loves his country, "What are we to do about it?"

This family is the symbol of all that is holy and best in our Nation and civilization. The father is the son of a noted and honorable Member of this House in days gone by. The little girl is the daughter of a distinguished Senator. In a noble and unique sense they belong to the Nation; and yet the hateful hand of crime has been thrust into that sacred domicile and the little family has been made the victim of the most heinous, contemptible, outrageous crime in our history.

Mr. Speaker, this is a call to every sane American-minded man and woman to find out whether the time is not here that the good people of this country must arouse themselves to stem the accursed, abominable, hell-born flood of crime and lawlessness and pitiless invasion of the rights of decent law-abiding citizens. [Applause.]

We can not face this situation much longer with idle words. We are in need of a fundamental spiritual awakening in this Nation. Goodness is almighty, but we have been asleep. We have here all that is needed to save our beloved Nation from moral collapse. We have the brains. We have the character. Surely we are not ready to admit that there is any band of criminals in the world that can successfully flout the intellectual and spiritual resources of the whole American people?

I would like to have those dear people up there in that mountain home know that every heart in this House and in every home that we represent goes out to them in the profoundest sympathy, in the deepest affection; and that we dedicate ourselves to the task of stemming the accursed flood of greed and violence that has engulfed them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I stated a while ago we would be compelled to go along with this bill. I am not going to object to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I serve notice now that I will object to any other request that may be made for leave to address the House. We must go along with this appropriation bill and get through with it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I heard the gentleman from Tennessee make that same statement just as emphatically and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] make a similar statement with equal emphasis a few moments ago. Now, it so happens——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

GEN. ENOCH H. CROWDER

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication and will state that this communication was sent to the Chair in Spanish. It has been translated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG], and the Chair is confident it is an accurate translation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
Speaker House of Representatives,
Republic of United States of America,
Washington, D. C.:

The Chamber of Representatives, in the name of the people of Cuba, expresses to the Nation through you, its honorable Representatives, its sincere condolences in the death of Gen. Enoch H. Crowder, illustrious American, a great friend to the Republic, and linked with its political history through most meritorious services.

Dr. RAFAEL GUAS INCLAN,
President Chamber of Representatives,
Republic of Cuba.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11897) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes; and, pending that, I should like to reach an agreement with the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] that on the first paragraph, under "Pay of the Army," commencing on page 8, line 18, and ending with line 20 on page 12, debate on that provision and all amendments thereto be limited to three hours, the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from California and myself.

I say three hours, because this is the most important provision of the bill, and I think there should be ample discussion, and I have had more requests for time already from men who are prepared to discuss this provision than the one hour and a half that would be under my control.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11897, the War Department appropriation bill; and, pending that, asks unanimous consent that the committee have general debate to the extent of three hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from California, on the paragraph beginning on page 8 and ending with line 20, page 12, the debate to be confined to the provisions and amendments thereto.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think two hours will be ample to discuss this matter. I will say to the gentleman that I am going to offer a point of order to a large part of this paragraph, and if the point of order is sustained by the Chair, this will eliminate a considerable part of the debate. I want to cooperate with the gentleman, but at the same time I feel we should be making progress with this bill and that we should pass the bill as soon as we possibly can, and for that reason I suggest two hours.

Mr. COLLINS. If the point of order is sustained, of course, I shall not use any time.

Mr. BARBOUR. As there will undoubtedly be some discussion of the point of order, does not the gentleman think that two hours on the provision and the amendments, provided the point of order is overruled, would be sufficient?

Mr. COLLINS. I have requests for more time than that and I do not think we will save any time by unduly limiting debate, and I think we will really save time by providing for debate of one hour and a half to the side, I am frank to say to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. May I submit an inquiry?

Mr. BARBOUR. My only interest in the matter is that we proceed with the bill and get the bill passed.

Mr. COLLINS. I am just as anxious to do that as is the gentleman.

Mr. BARBOUR. I know that.

Mr. COLLINS. And I think we will save time by having three hours of debate. If it can be shortened, I shall be delighted to shorten it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why not proceed and find out about the point of order. I would like to reserve the right to object so that I may ask a question or two.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, the request of the gentleman, as I understood it, was that the debate upon this part of the bill be limited to a certain time and that there be no further debate upon it.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. DYER. That the debate is to be limited to this provision and all amendments thereto and that there will be no further debate.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The Speaker did not state that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the request again. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that there be general debate for three hours on the first paragraph of the bill under "Finance Department," from line 18, on page 8, to and including line 20, on page 12, and all amendments thereto, the debate to be confined to the bill, and the time to be controlled one-half by the gentleman from California and one-half by the gentleman from Mississippi. Is there objection?

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, let me make this suggestion. Will the gentleman agree to two hours and a half of debate?

Mr. COLLINS. I should like very much to do that, but I believe we will save time by making it three hours, because the speeches will be made anyway.

Mr. BARBOUR. I can not agree to that.

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman will permit, I do not believe we will save anything unless we can get some agreement that is reasonable, and we will have to go ahead then without any arrangement as to time.

Mr. COLLINS. I am confident we will spend more time than three hours if some arrangement is not made.

Mr. DYER. As one Member, I shall insist upon the rules of the House being observed in committee. We have finished general debate on the bill.

Mr. COLLINS. Well, I will amend the request and ask that it be limited to two hours and a half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi changes his request and asks that the debate be limited to two hours and a half. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee if there is any legislation on the appropriation bill in these pages as to which he proposes to limit debate?

Mr. COLLINS. No; not that the rules do not permit.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No legislation whatever?

Mr. BLANTON. None except what comes within the Holman rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me say that I find in these few pages more "provideds" and "provided furthers" than I have seen in any appropriation bill for a long, long time.

Mr. COLLINS. We are proceeding under the rules of the House, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We have here a lot of "provided furthers"; and with a limitation on debate, I am afraid that most of the time will be used by the principal members of the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. COLLINS. No, indeed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And those who are only members of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union will only be permitted to send some important amendments up to the desk——

Mr. SANDLIN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object, Mr. Speaker. If the gentleman will withhold his demand for the regular order, I shall not object.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the demand for the regular order temporarily.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to ask the chairman if those Members who are not members of the Appropriations Committee on the Committee on Military Affairs will have ample opportunity to offer amendments to each or every one of the several "provided furthers" in the appropriation bill?

Mr. COLLINS. I am positive of that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. With that assurance, I will not object, and we will see how we come out.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. COLLINS was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LANHAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARMY WAR COLLEGE

For expenses of the Army War College, being for the purchase of the necessary special stationery; textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, newspapers, and periodicals; maps; police utensils; employment of temporary, technical, or special services, and expenses of special lecturers; for the pay of employees; and for all other absolutely necessary expenses, $71,880.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, in the items in the paragraph of the appropriation bill we have so far considered, I notice that there are minor reductions in the budgetary estimate. I ask the attention of the Republican members of the committee whether they joined with the Democratic members in these reductions in the various items? For instance, the item under consideration appropriates $71,880, and the Budget estimate was $81,800, and the committee has recommended a cut of $10,000. Does the gentleman from California regard that as an inordinate cut? In prior paragraphs there are cuts of $10,000 or a little more, and I would like to ascertain the view of the minority Members as to whether they think there has been any drastic cut in these various paragraphs.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say that this particular paragraph is not a drastic cut.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the prior paragraphs there are cuts of less than 10 per cent, and the gentleman does not think that they will do any harm to the service.

Mr. BARBOUR. The gentleman is grouping a lot of cuts in a lot of items. I think the most of them can be absorbed.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wanted to get the view of the gentleman from California. I have compared them with the appropriations last year and the estimates of the Budget, and I could not see anything drastic in their effect.

Mr. BARBOUR. No; they are made on account of present financial conditions and in an effort to economize where economies can be effected.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. Mr. Chairman, we are all in favor of economy to be practiced by some one else and to be effected through the curtailment of activities in which we are not personally interested, but it is rather disconcerting to us who want economies bad enough to take them wherever we can get them to learn that whatever committee recommends an economy, whether the Special Economy Committee or the Committee on Appropriations, however able and experienced its members may be, yet that committee always selects that particular economy which can not be effected, and which, if put in operation, will ultimately result in added expense—it is rather difficult for an unsophisticated mind like my own to grasp how the dropping of 2,000 Army officers from the pay roll is going to increase expense. This statement made by the opponents of this economy, of course, can not be maintained.

The whole public is tired of this hide-and-seek type of economy progress we are making, and the informed public is disgusted with the President of the United States for continually berating Congress in general terms for not effecting economy, and then, when any specific economy is suggested, sending hotfooted his officers, his admirals, his generals, his secretaries, and everybody whom he controls or with whom he has influence en masse to Capitol Hill to defeat that particular proposal.

I am not especially informed upon the details of Army affairs, yet it is well known that we have 5,000 more Army officers than Great Britain provides for the same size standing army.

I shall read the last paragraph of a letter which I have just received from the interior of the United States:

> May I urge upon you to demand that Government annual expenses be immediately reduced by at least $1,000,000,000?
> Very truly yours,
> J. N. CAMDEN.

That is not from an irresponsible man. That is from an outstanding citizen of Kentucky, one who was elected to and filled with distinction a seat in the United States Senate. Whether or not he had in mind that certain expenses are irreducible I do not know, but I do know that two Senators now occupying seats in the other body and one a member of the Finance Committee agree with him and are insistent that expenses can be cut $1,000,000,000. The statement of the President and others that all but one billion seven hundred millions is fixed expense is, I submit, relative. They are not so fixed that they can not be unfixed. When one gets away from this environment of officeholders, of admirals, generals, and such, he sees the fixedness of expense differently and finds the sentiment of this country is that we must, that it is our imperative and paramount duty to effect sincere, substantial, honest-to-God economies. The enormous cost of government has become intolerable, and the people look to us for relief. I have supported every recommendation for economy, and, disagreeable as it is to dismiss anyone from the position they are conscientiously filling, I shall have to support the recommendation of the committee to drop these 2,000 Army officers whom the committee says are unnecessary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend on line 19 by striking out "$71,880" and insert in lieu thereof "$70,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Page 7, line 19, strike out "$71,880" and insert "$70,000."

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That will cut out a few newspapers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, instruments, and material for instruction; employment of temporary technical, special, and clerical services; and for other necessary expenses of instruction, at the Command and General Staff School, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., $40,000.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Members of the House are all receiving some remarkable letters. I have one in particular that relates to this bill. It is written on the stationery of the Kemper Military School, situated at Boonville, Mo., and reads as follows:

> KEMPER MILITARY SCHOOL,
> Boonville, Mo., May 10, 1932.
> Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN, M. C.,
> DEAR MR. COCHRAN: We appreciate very much the courtesy of your answer to our recent telegram about the reduction of the Army personnel. At the risk of taking some of your time which you had rather spend in studying the problems before you, let me risk a few more words to let you know how many people back home feel.
> We want economy and lots of it, but we want wise economy.
> 1. Forget the bonus. Nobody is entitled to it and nobody but a grafter wants it. We have a lot of silly sentiment about past military services that will bankrupt us in time. Save $2,000,000,000 now and many times as much later.
> 2. Slash the appropriations for veterans' hospitals, etc. Most of this is just as silly and unwarranted. Eight hundred million dollars now, and only God knows what it will grow to.
> 3. Close the useless posts and navy yards, savings millions of "pork."
> 4. Kill or defer appropriations for rivers, saving millions.

> A. M. HITCH, Superintendent.

I wondered why this school was so anxious that the 2,000 officers should be saved. Therefore I called up the War Department, and I asked the War Department if the Government of the United States was assigning any officers to that school and whether the officers were being paid out of the War Department appropriation. I am advised by the War Department this morning that a Col. J. B. Barnes is assigned there and that he receives $600 a month. I am advised further that Capt. Frederick L. Gurlack is also assigned there and that he receives $529 a month. Mr. Chairman, on the letterhead, as will be seen, are the names of eight men, every one of them having a military title. It is a school that, I understand, requires the students to pay for their tuition. Why is it that the Government of the United States should be required to spend in a private school $1,129 a month to teach students for which the school is being paid by the students?

Mr. GIFFORD. Would not these officers be receiving that sum of $1,129 a month, just the same, if they were not assigned to that school?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. These two Army officers are retired, on active duty. More money is paid to men on active duty than those on the retired list.

Mr. GIFFORD. They would be drawing the same amount, would they not?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. They would be retired and would not be receiving that amount of money. I do not want to disturb the national defense; but it seems to me that if this same situation exists all over the country where the War Department is assigned men to duty in military schools and they are being paid out of the appropriation that this Congress makes for the War Department there is an opportunity to economize and to at least do away with those officers and let the school pay the officers that teach the students at the school.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not quite an ordinary thing to receive a letter from a writer abusing Congress for not reducing expenditures and then probably in the next mail receive a letter from the same writer urging us to appropriate additional money for some matter in which he is particularly interested?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I have many such letters in my office, one asking for economies and the other asking for appropriations.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. And is it not also a fact that there are a great many of these Regular Army officers who are now on the retired list drawing pay to the extent of as much as $600 a month and salary for that much or more from the Federal Government?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. My colleague is entirely right. There are many retired officers who, upon being retired, immediately secure another position. You asked in the economy bill to deprive a veteran who had an income of $1,500 a year, if he was single, from any benefits under the veterans' act. Why was not such a provision suggested if a retired officer had an income of, say $3,500, that his retired pay should be limited?

I have replied to the writer of the letter I just read advising the gentleman that I would not vote to close up hospitals where men wounded in line of duty and who suffered from disease in line of duty, as well as other veterans, are being treated. I have told him that, in my opinion, the private who seeks the bonus is not a grafter, but that privates who served during the World War were as honest as officers. He has been informed that the President has the power to close up Army posts and navy yards, if he comes to the conclusion they are not needed. Further, I told him I would continue to vote for river and harbor improvements as well as for flood control work.

Information comes to me from a most reliable source that one of the officers on active duty at this school receiving money from the Public Treasury owns one-third of the school and benefits from its profits. If I am in error I wish one of my colleagues would correct me, as I desire to do no one an injustice.

I say, Mr. Chairman, and I call this to the attention of the subcommittee in charge of the bill, there should be a proviso on this bill that will prevent the War Department from assigning paid officers to private schools. There is an opportunity to economize.

The President urges us to cut—cut to the bone—and here, when the committee suggests a cut, we find the Republican side of the House also unanimous against the recommendation. We find the Secretary of War in opposition, and we find in the papers a statement where General Brown is quoted as having said that he would submit to the President a plan to reduce flood-control work $3,500,000; and the lower Mississippi River improvement work would also be curtailed. Further he would reduce other projects $6,500,000. I say the Congress writes the laws and the Secretary of War and and Chief of Engineers are appointed to administer the laws—not to dictate to the Congress what should be done.

Again I say, I do not want to cripple our national defense, but I feel there is plenty of room for savings in this bill without injuring the national defense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I am in opposition to the amendment for the purpose of decreasing this bill, in the limited time I shall take, because as we get down to the question of whether there is legislation in this appropriation bill which, under the rules set up under the Budget system, is not supposed to be there we are likely to have small opportunity for discussion of what is really in the long-involved paragraph which cuts down the Army of the United States.

I would not impugn the motives of any Member, particularly the chairman of this Appropriations Subcommittee, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS], a hard-working, conscientious, and studious man. He has called the attention of all Members by personal letter to a speech made by him, in which he lays down some modern proposals as to war—machine war. I disagree with many of the gentleman's proposals and desire to say that from the gentleman's own State of Mississippi there came to the front in the War between the States, 1861 to 1865, a private soldier who developed so rapidly in skill and tactics that he became a general—a man almost illiterate. That man probably worked more physical punishment on the northern army than any other one man individually, and, with the aid of his troops, he played tremendous havoc. He was Gen. Nathan B. Forrest; and when he was asked to what he attributed his success in these combats which he had with the northern armies and was asked for his tactics he said, "The answer is simple—get there firstest with the mostest men."

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I just want to say that General Forrest's statement in answer to General Morgan was: "I took a short cut and got there first with the most men." The expression which the gentleman used is slang that has been attributed to General Forrest, who never made use of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, whether he said it or not, it is effective just the same, "Get there firstest with the mostest men."

Now, it is impossible to have the men just get there, without training and without leaders, and General Forrest, of Mississippi, was a natural leader. Had he been trained to work with other leaders his fame would have been much greater.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, we need the officers we have because they are a part of a coordinated system for national defense. A part of that system contemplates the training of officers, and training them particularly as to the division plan of army formation, army direction, and army management. That is where we were weak when we entered the World War.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. General Forrest's statement did not say "Get there firstest with the most officers," did it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, General Forrest was an officer and the equal of several officers, and had he had the education and training he would not have fallen into such a quarrel with General Bragg and with other chief officers of the Confederacy and probably would have been ranked with the most distinguished generals of both Armies of that intense period. But I do not desire that a discussion of those days shall take too much of the time that I want to use for explaining the need for a proper Army in these days.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am sure the gentleman has carefully read the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]; and if so, I think he is bound to draw therefrom this conclusion, that the purpose of the gentleman from Mississippi in giving that information to the House was prompted by the hope that more thought and consideration should be given to placing proper and modern equipment in the hands of our Army so that it can "get there first."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I realize that; but I am sure that the finest equipment is reduced in value without skilled, trained officers as well as brave men who know that their officers are thoroughly proficient.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a great many citizens have begun at last to give considerable study to the increase of subservient influences against this Government and are learning how all of these influences are binding themselves together. You will be surprised to know that I have been receiving resolutions from organizations as far away as the extreme Pacific Northwest, indorsing certain paragraphs in this bill as marked up by the gentleman from Mississippi, which paragraphs, in my opinion, greatly damage our Army, which is a small army, not a large one. These resolutions indorse the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] in name personally. The writers of these resolutions have had advance information, for I have received them dated as far back as the 1st of March, coming to me from that long distance, at a time when this bill was in the ice box, with the membership assumed not to know exactly what was in it.

I have in my hand a report of a meeting held only last week in a neighboring State, attended by some of these more polite pacifists——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly, but as best I can, I shall insist upon the debate following the rules now, and I shall object and make the point of order that debate upon the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, on page 8, line 3, to strike out "$40,000" and insert "$39,000."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Page 8, line 3, strike out "$40,000" and insert "$39,000."

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington wish to be heard on the amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do, Mr. Chairman.

That is a small cut. It would be better to make a cut here that might affect the purchase of books of reference, scientific and professional papers, and so on, than to make a cut in places where it will affect the personnel of this Army of ours, which is small anyway for a population of 123,000,000 people, particularly when I can show, if I have the time, that there is an organized and well-understood movement against this Government. In that movement are organizations of high and low degree. It reaches up to those with very polite and well-meaning aims. But even these polite ones say the trimming of our Army, its officers and forces, is part of a great class struggle bound to come, they claim. They want our military forces weakened. I have it here in writing, made by ministers at this meeting. Perhaps we do not see the signs of the times.

Perhaps some of us who would like to cut down the Army from the standpoint of expense, possibly, can not see the forces working both here and abroad to weaken this Army, cut out its discipline, cut out its leaders, and leave us a still smaller Army than we should have in a country the size of the United States. I assure you, my colleagues, that no nation can afford to be without some force if it intends to maintain itself as a sovereignty. That force, in a great Nation like the United States, can be implied for awhile; we can go along for a little while on momentum, because we are great and powerful; but every nation that intends to act with dignity and maintain its position must have force, represented by an army and a navy, which may never even be used for the purposes of force. It is kept as a guaranty. I submit that in this great country we must maintain a trained Army. The Army learned something during the World War. It learned how inefficient it was in cooperation and how weak in the training of its officers—except a few. We need a decent, well-officered Army for the fourth most populated Nation in the world—a Nation envied by so many others.

We are in a position where we are not seriously threatened with foreign invasion. We are separated by the seas, and with friendly nations to the north and to the south, so that we are in a position to promote advanced ideas and even peace, if we do not permit our foundations weakened and gnawed at by those who exist in high positions and who permit themselves to be the tools, if I may use the word, of those with more ulterior motives.

I ask each one of you to ponder carefully before you come to the point of stripping our already small but efficient Army. And, finally, remember that no body of men, no matter how patriotic, as we know our soldiers to be, can be as efficient as we want them to be if they are not maintained at a proper number and do not have the proper leaders. We want them to be efficient not only in time of war but in time of fire, storm, distress, or possible riots. Our small Army is scattered throughout all of our States and outlying possessions. It is not always a war machine. It does much of a civil nature. It may even be necessary this coming winter, together with its barracks, tents, food, supplies, and organization, to help take care of the unemployed. In fact, I wish we had some way right now to enlarge our citizens' training camps so that we could open tents and barracks to a large number of the unemployed this very summer to keep them from walking the long, weary roads, to feed them, encourage them, until the employment situation can be righted.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I assume the gentleman has made a very microscopic examination of this bill and has submitted amendments embodying all of the savings he thinks can be effected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, not microscropic, but I welcome the opportunity to say that I voted all the way along with the Economy Committee except on one minor matter and on the question of the consolidation of the Army and the Navy, which I thought to be a mistake, and offered to the House without sufficient consideration. I would again vote against that consolidation if it came up. I am not a member of the Appropriations Committee. I hope the gentleman from Alamaba will not attempt to divert me further in my effort to speak on a most serious subject. I do not intend to bother the committee much further with small amendments. I had to take this opportunity to state my earnest convictions which have come as a result of a great deal of study, not on the particular dollars and cents paragraphs of this bill, but on world conditions and the dangers which may reach the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman's amendment involves a reduction in appropriations.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Of $1,000.

Mr. BYRNS. For the purchase of textbooks. I want to ask the gentleman if he understood the chairman of the subcommittee who has this bill in charge to say he was entirely willing to accept this amendment, which means a reduction?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then I shall not withdraw it. I am willing to see $1,000 taken off at this particular place, but I hope the membership may be fully informed by the time we reach the paragraphs that are so serious and so hurtful in the damage that they will do.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I simply want to say that the committee went over these items and considered them very carefully. After the Budget had reduced them very substantially below last year the committee again went over them and we all agreed that this was the least with which this school could get along. I think if the Committee of the Whole understands the situation in that way it will vote down this amendment, and it should be voted down.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman from Washington seems to have concluded from his study of the life of General Forrest that since he had no college education you should not buy books for the officers of the present Army.

Mr. BARBOUR. I did not hear the gentleman. Were the gentleman's remarks directed to me or to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I would like the gentleman to make it clear to us that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] was mistaken in his remarks, when he stated it cost $1,129 to maintain an officer in that particular school.

I would like to have the gentleman from California make it plain that it does not cost $1,129, because if these gentlemen are retired we would only save one-fourth of it. I did not like to have it appear that we paid $1,129 for these officers for teaching in this particular school, because if they were retired the Government would have to pay them three-fourths of their pay. Is not that true?

Mr. BARBOUR. The Government would pay, under this bill, if they were retired, three-fourths of their base pay and longevity pay. Just what that would amount to I can not state, because it varies in the case of different officers and I do not know in just what pay grades these men are, but they would receive, under the provisions of this bill, three-fourths of their base pay and their longevity pay, whatever that amounts to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

WE MUST REDUCE THE EXPENSES OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Chairman, I have preferred to make a few observations upon a paragraph that will not draw particular fire, for the reason that I want to direct attention more particularly to what I believe ought to be the attitude of the Congress toward this appropriation bill and appropriation bills in general rather than to a specific item.

Members of the Congress at this time are being flooded with telegrams and letters upon various items in the pending bill, just as we have been flooded with letters and telegrams upon every appropriation bill that has been reported by the Appropriations Committee. There has been not one exception. We are told that the individual items can not be reduced.

I am not upon the particular subcommittee that prepared the pending bill, but I do know the months of study and the infinite care that members of the subcommittee have given to this particular subject.

I have in my hand a letter that has been sent to me, as I assume it has been sent to all the Members of the Congress from the Ohio Chamber of Commerce. It is an appeal to the Congress for a reduction of national expenditures. The letter reads in part as follows:

> The Ohio Chamber of Commerce views with consternation the attitude of Congress toward public expenditures at this grave crisis in the Nation's history. Among our members are the largest employers of labor in Ohio—manufacturers, railroads, bankers, merchants, farmers, utilities, and professional men.
> Idle men walk our streets. Unused cars rest upon the sidings. Incoming mails bring no orders.
> Ohio business has done its best to meet the situation. We have staggered employment. We have cut salaries and wages and passed dividends. We have introduced man-a-block campaigns for giving home work to the jobless. We have dug down in our pockets for community funds. We have privately helped our relatives and friends. We have paid extra taxes for local relief. We have drawn upon our dwindling reserves and exhausted our credit. We are reaching the end of the passage!
> In the meantime, a balanced Budget, which is the basis of the Nation's credit, recedes from view like a mirage.
> Everyone knows what the trouble is: Our servants have become our masters!
> Ohio business appeals to you to forget parties, to forget blocs within parties, to turn a deaf ear to the manufactured clamor of special groups, and to think only at this solemn hour in terms of the whole people of our common country!

The foregoing message is similar to that contained in a multitude of letters that are coming to my desk. Here is one from the National Retail Hardware Association which says:

> The welfare of the country as a whole is of much more importance than the self-interest of areas and groups.

Here is another from an outstanding citizen of Idaho, which says:

> I hope every bill increasing taxes will be defeated. To my mind the whole thing is incredible, that any business the size of our National Government could possibly expect to balance its Budget by increasing its profits instead of reducing its expenses.

Many farmers in the State that I have the honor in part to represent have not made enough money during the last year to pay their interest and their taxes; business men write me that they are drawing upon their dwindling reserves and are exhausting their credit; workmen write me that for months they have had no employment at all or else not more than two or three days' employment per week.

Everyone knows what the trouble is. Members want to reduce but at every turn they are met by selfish cliques and groups, special interests, and special areas, all insisting that exceptions must be made in their special cases.

I remember when I was a boy in the public schools, about 1891, a speech was made by the then Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Hon. Thomas B. Reed, in which he said, partly in apology for mounting expenditures and partly in pride, I believe, for our expanding Nation: "This country has come to be a billion-dollar country." And why? "Because," he said, "we have now reached the time, the first in American history, when in days of peace it is costing $1,000,000,000 to bear the national expenses for a period of two years."

In 1913, the year before the beginning of the World War, if the Speaker of the House of Representatives had measured the greatness of our country by the length of time it would have taken to expend $1,000,000,000, he would have said: "Ours is a billion-dollar country because we have become so great that in days of peace it costs $1,000,000,000 to run our Government, not for a period of two years but for a period of one year."

If the present Speaker of the House were to come before this Chamber and say that we are a billion-dollar country, measuring the worth of our country by the time consumed in expending $1,000,000,000, he would say, "We are a billion-dollar nation in 1932 because it costs $1,000,000,000 to bear the expenses of our Government for 90 days." And what has gone on in our Federal Government has gone on in our State and county governments.

In 1913 it cost us $2,900,000,000 to run the Federal, the State, and the county governments. Last year it cost us $13,000,000,000 to run these different activities, or a grand expenditure of slightly more than $1,000,000,000 for every month in the year. Of this amount, the Federal Government has the responsibility of approximately one-third.

Every time an appropriation bill is brought in here with reduced amounts for the different items, immediately the Members of the Congress are flooded with petitions and letters and resolutions denouncing the Congress for proposing reduction of the specific items and then demanding that the sum total be reduced. It is a monstrous thought that you can hold the items to the level of what they have been and reduce the sum total. It is the sum total that represents the combined items in the bills.

This year it looks as though the expenditures of the Federal Government would be $4,482,000,000. It looks as though the national revenues would be not more than $2,200,000,000, or, in other words, that it will cost us $2,282,000,000 more to run our Government than we shall receive by way of income. More than that, in spite of the efforts that we are making to balance the Budget, it seems altogether doubtful that we shall be able to provide revenues for next year adequate to meet the expenditures of government.

When we are face to face with a proposed increase of expenditure, we must remember that in all probability it will require a bond issue to meet the increase in appropriation. If that be true, then we ought to ask ourselves the question whether or not the item is of such importance that it justifies the issue of bonds by the United States in order to meet the expenditures that would be incurred?

The fight that is now being made to prevent reductions in items in the War Department appropriation bill is not different from the fight that was made against the individual items of all the other appropriation bills that have gone before.

Let us refresh our minds by turning back to just a few of the supply bills. Suppose we begin with the bill carrying appropriations for the District of Columbia. The Appropriations Committee sought in every way to meet the rightful needs of the District, but at the same time endeavored to bring about economies. Here is an illustration of how local self-interest can obliterate the national point of view. In the city of Washington are a number of splendid daily papers. They are alive to public questions. They are berating Congress for extravagance; they are demanding in editorial after editorial reduction of the National Budget. But what was the attitude of these same agencies for the expression of public opinion of the District when it came to District items? Not one of the papers published in the District of Columbia was in sympathy with the work of the committee. They were in favor of reduction of national expenditures, but they wanted the axe to fall some place else. If the committee thought economies could be made by making reductions for the improvement of streets, the voice of the District protested against the reduction. If the Congress proposed the deferment of the construction of a bridge, the voice of the District declared that this great work must not be postponed. If the committee proposed economies in relief work for the District of Columbia and suggested that this work be cared for by private gifts, as is done so largely in other cities, we were told that it was inhuman, that no reduction must be made here.

If reductions were proposed that would fall upon pay rolls within the District, the voice of the District was loud in protest.

Indeed, I challenge the Members of this Congress to find a newspaper in the city of Washington that was agreeable to the reduction of amount of appropriation or to the postponement of a single item of any importance touching the city of Washington or the District of Columbia.

The attitude to which voice is given by the newspapers of Washington is not peculiar to this city, but is the attitude of communities and groups of individuals and organizations throughout the United States when any appropriation bill is reported from the committee that trenches upon their activities.

Specious and apparently sound reasons can be found for standing against reductions. If the Appropriations Committee proposes to reduce amounts for scientific work, for experimental investigations, the hands of those who are affected are raised against it. The Congress is urged to override the committee because the members of the committee "have no vision."

If the Appropriations Committee proposes reduction of appropriation for public buildings or other Federal improvements, we are told by Members of Congress and by those who will be affected that we are antagonistic to labor. If we propose a restudy of the moneys appropriated under the head of veterans' establishments, notwithstanding the fact that every member of the committee is in favor of providing every adequate need for the victims of the World War and other wars and their needy dependents, we are told that these items must not be disturbed because to do so would suggest disloyalty.

If the committee proposes moderation in naval expenditures, navy yards are at once aroused, interested groups are at once in action, and members of the committee are accused of being unpatriotic and, indeed, of representing the people of foreign lands instead of the people of the United States, notwithstanding the fact that any member of the committee would gladly sacrifice his life for his country.

The immediate bill that has been brought before you for your consideration carries more than $386,000,000 for the War Department, of which more than $281,000,000 is for military activities Yet during general debate the committee has been under the constant fire of a multitude of groups and individuals who are demanding greater and still greater appropriations

I am not a member of the subcommittee that has reported the bill, but my appeal now is to the Members of the Congress to consider the items of the bill in the light of the real needs of our country, to consider the items in the bill not from the standpoint of personal friendship, not from the standpoint of localities to be served, or groups to be benefited, but alone from that greater, that broader standpoint, the national needs that every citizen of the Republic will make every sacrifice to sustain

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. I agree with the gentleman 100 per cent. But in addition, is it not true that the Cabinet and employees at the White House have been up here lobbying against reductions of appropriations?

Mr. FRENCH. I do not doubt that heads of departments are peculiarly impressed with the activities they represent. But we must look at the whole picture. The President is right when he says that the lobbyists are in Washington as thick as locusts. We meet them in the hallways. They mill through our offices, and they pack our galleries. They enlist the cooperation of groups at home who do not consult the people, but nevertheless pretend to give expression to what they say the people demand. They flood us with letters and telegrams which, if we heeded, would result in greater appropriations and not less. I am told that the cost of telegrams alone received by Members of Congress for days at a time would aggregate $10,000 a day.

The Members of this Congress must not permit the selfish demands of individuals and groups, who are asking for larger and still larger appropriations to blind them to the importance of scaling down the budgets that we are called upon to meet.

No one can view the present conditions either within our own country or abroad without being impressed that the essential thing that confronts this world of ours is a by-product, an immediate by-product of the World War. Ten million men can not sacrifice their lives without producing consequences of incalculable importance upon world affairs. Nations can not squander their wealth and expect when the debauch is over to be as strong as they were before. The hysteria, the madness, the poverty, the unrest that pervade our country and that pervade all countries of the world are the immediate results of the World War.

The unrest that exists in France can not be charged to the great President of the French Republic who last week paid with his life at the assassin's hand. The unhappiness that exists in Germany can not be chargeable to President von Hindenburg. The misfortune of Great Britain can not be brought to the door of Prime Minister MacDonald or of Stanley Baldwin; the plight of Russia goes farther back than soviet rule; and the misfortunes that rest upon the people of the United States can not be brought to the feet of President Hoover any more than can the World War be chargeable to the late President Wilson.

It is the responsibility of thoughtful people, of thoughtful Members of this Chamber to rise above the narrow demands of party advantage in seeking the welfare of our great land.

Mr. Chairman, I was a Member of the war Congress, and I recall the spirit of that Congress that seemed to be almost heroic. It was the spirit that pervaded America; it was the spirit that pervaded the officers and the men of the Army and the Navy who fought upon land and sea.

Two incidents occurred within this Chamber that I want to call to the attention of the Members at this moment—incidents that portrayed the sublime spirit of heroism and of courage that ought to be here now.

Just before the resolution was passed in which was recognized a state of war between the United States and the Imperial Government of Germany, that gifted and beloved leader of the Democratic side of this Chamber, standing upon the spot where I now stand, told the House that he could not support the resolution. It was an hour that tested the souls of men. Claude Kitchin stood opposed to the President of the United States. He was not in sympathy with the will of the majority of the Members of Congress; he stood against the unquestioned public opinion of the country at the time, and these were his words:

Profoundly impressed with the gravity of the situation, appreciating to the fullest the penalties which a war-mad moment will impose, my conscience and judgment, after mature thought and fervent prayer for rightful guidance have marked out clearly the path of my duty, and I have made up my mind to walk it, if I go barefooted and alone.

I recall the hush that fell upon this Chamber.

And then a few weeks later I remember another day when courage of high order was demanded. The chairman of the Military Affairs Committee found it impossible to follow President Wilson or the wishes of the majority party in the House upon the question of a selective service law. Telegrams and letters and petitions were flooding the Members of this Chamber, as the urge was made that we leave the Army to the voluntary wish of individual citizens of the Republic. Leadership upon the defense bill passed from the Democratic side to the Republican side of this body, and I remember that remarkable patriot and warrior, Julius Kahn, as he urged with all the fervor of his being the adoption of a selective service law, and I remember the substance of his appeal, if not his direct language, when he uttered the thought, "My own service in this Congress is nothing; my life itself is nothing; the life of my country, that flag—they are everything."

In conclusion, if I could make an appeal in this hour that if realized would carry dignity of highest order to the conduct of this Chamber and that would inspire the citizenship of America as little else can do, it would be that the spirit of these men, the courage of these men, pervade the hearts of the Members of this body, regardless of party, and that they forget the petty, the local, the personal, and think rather of our responsibilities in the larger aspect and dimensions of this great country that we seek to serve. [Applause.]

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I think while we are considering this Army appropriation bill that every Member of this House will welcome the opportunity, which, it seems to me, is now favorably presented, to get some views to the people of this country about the attitude of this Congress on what we actually seek to accomplish. It is the unqualified desire of this Congress, as it is the unquestionable desire of the whole country, to cut the expenses of the Government, and to that extent reduce the necessity of increasing taxes. The thing the people do not understand, as is evidenced in the barrage of letters which they are now showering on us, is that two-thirds of the $4,000,000,000, approximately, which we expend each year are fixed charges, and that this Congress can not curtail those charges without becoming a party to the repudiation of obligations legally incurred by the Government. The public very evidently does not understand that only as to the remaining one-third, approximately $1,600,000,000 or $1,700,000,000, can the Congress curtail disbursements.

What are the facts? What has this Congress done? So far as this House is concerned, the appropriation bills for the fiscal year of 1933, which it has just passed, have cut the appropriations for Government expenses in 1933, as compared with the appropriations which were made for 1932 by more than $500,000,000. That is a very conservative statement, and I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] will agree with me.

Mr. BYRNS. It is $563,000,000.

Mr. BEEDY. Yes; $563,000,000, to be exact. In addition to that, we have passed an economy bill, which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] brought into this House, after a great deal of labor, in which we further cut the running expenses of the Government by $43,000,000. Let me put it another way. This House in its current appropriation bills has cut under the limitations imposed by the Budget more than $175,000,000 for the fiscal year 1933.

I had a letter from a gentleman yesterday that said in effect, "I wish to suggest to you that the saving of $50,000,000 or $200,000,000 in Government expenses is a mere bagatelle." Another wrote, in substance, that the Congress should cut the cost of running the Government a billion dollars. Without any disrespect to such people, it clearly shows that they do not understand what they are talking about. The person last referred to certainly did not understand that he was suggesting that we cut appropriations for running the Government by 68 per cent. Of course, such a cut would render the Government inoperative and precipitate a revolution. I undertake to say that, barring the Congresses of the Great War days, no Congress ever faced a more delicate and difficult task, and no Congress in both parties ever showed a more earnest, sincere desire to do the indispensible and helpful thing by continuing the Government and at the same time meeting the necessity of the present time and satisfying the popular demands by cutting appropriations to the bone. [Applause.]

When I suggested to my friend, the gentleman who wrote me to disparage a savings of $50,000,000, or even $200,000,000, that a $200,000,000 saving as to the $1,600,000,000, or total cost of running the Government, was a cut in overhead of 13 per cent, and when I suggested to him that we had cut the expenses of this Government in this House by more than $500,000,000 against those of last year, I think I submitted to him, and I now submit to the country, facts which they should consider; and, having considered, should give this Congress credit for handling a difficult task effectively. I for one am discouraged with the apparent indifference that the public shows toward earnest efforts on the part of Congress to perform its work. I can overlook it only when I stop to consider that the average citizen is too busy with his own private affairs to understand the details and the infinite difficulty of the task this Congress is facing in terms of accomplishment. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I am very much delighted to have heard the statements made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] and the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], members of the minority party upon the floor of this House, in view of what has developed within the last few days in the public prints. I took occasion a few days ago to rise in this place and to undertake to point out to this House and to the country what I conceived to be a very grave and serious mistake upon the part of the Executive in issuing his public statement, the direct and inevitable effect of which was to bring the entire Congress of the United States into disrepute before the American people. That was the interpretation that was given to the message by the people at large, and it has been reflected here in the avalanche of letters that all Members of this House have been receiving—and I now see that they have been received on both sides of the Chamber—derogating in the bitterest terms the activities of this Congress and undertaking to point out that we have been absolutely derelict in our duties and are unmindful of the obligation that rests upon us in the present circumstances of conscientiously undertaking to reduce expenses of government. I rise at this time simply to say that it seems to me that the criticism that was directed at the message that came from the White House has been thoroughly justified by the developments now disclosed.

I think it is a matter of supreme importance that the people of the country do know the truth about what this Congress is undertaking to do in the matter of economy, and I think the Congress of the United States ought to receive at the hands of the people the credit to which it is entitled for the earnest and diligent efforts as representatives of the American people in this body. [Applause.] I hope that some publicity may be given to the true facts of the record of this Congress along these lines, and I reiterate that it was absolutely unfair, whatever may have been the motives that inspired the declaration, in the face of the record, and it was an unjustified public attack upon the record of the Congress of the United States in its desire to meet the present situation. And it has been suggested to me by my colleague [Mr. McDUFFIE] that it is unfair to the Republican side and to their Representatives as well as it was unfair to the majority side, to bring out a public statement, the inevitable, and as I now believe, deliberate purpose of which was to arouse public sentiment in America against the law-making branch of the Government to the political advantage of the President.

Mr. BROWNING. Does the gentleman have any hope that the same agencies that carried the false impression will carry the impression to the country given by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

Mr. BANKHEAD. I indulge the hope it may be possible, but judging by past experience, I have very grave doubt that they will.

Mr. PARSONS. And does the gentleman believe that the President has been entirely fair in presenting the truth of this matter to the country?

Mr. BANKHEAD. He has not. He gave Congress no credit for the great reductions made in his own budget. I want to make this statement in justice to some of the representatives of the press. It has come to me from the newspapermen themselves, and this statement has been made upon the floor of this House, that the men in this press gallery undertake to send the facts back to their papers, but the publishers of those papers and the editors of those papers will absolutely color and doctor the real facts so as to undertake to reflect partisan advantage. That is the complaint I have. It is not so much against the representatives of the press, who sit in this gallery, as it is distortion of the truth upon the part of those who publish the news. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

I join the gentleman from Alabama in the expressions of congratulation to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] upon their manly statements on this floor. For weeks Congress has been attacked maliciously and willfully and unjustifiably. Of course, all of us realize that it is because of political reasons that the Republican press desires again to recreate the superman, but I am of the opinion, Mr. Chairman, that the friends of the President have gone too far in trying to reestablish him; and his messages and statements will not have the effect that he and his political friends believe they will have upon the country. There is such a thing as overdoing things, and they have done it.

We have all received hundreds and thousands of telegrams attacking Congress, vilifying the membership for neglecting to reduce expenditures, and demanding the balancing of the Budget. I have said that it is absolutely impossible (and I am borne out in that statement by the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Idaho) to balance the Budget overnight and make up a deficiency for the fiscal year of 1932 of two and one-half billion dollars, which has been the result of Republican maladministration. We must recognize that nearly 72 per cent of the expenditures go for militarism—for the Army and Navy and for such expenditures as are chargeable to militarism. Therefore it is absolutely impossible, out of the balance of one and one-half billions, as these gentlemen have stated, to save two and one-half billions to balance the Budget. But people do not understand it. They are being misled by false propaganda, false publicity, which is neither helpful nor beneficial to the party or to Congress.

I am indeed gratified that these two outstanding Republicans were to-day brave enough and honest enough to have called attention to this abuse. Let us hope that in the future there will be other Republicans who will have the courage of their convictions and who will speak out and condemn these attacks that have been made in the last few weeks; that is, ever since the President decided that conditions were right to launch his campaign for reelection.

I have before me a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 22, in which I inserted the expenditures for the War and Navy Departments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. The statistics show that in the last fiscal year we appropriated nearly $900,000,000 for the Army and Navy alone. I have placed in the RECORD the amounts that were appropriated when I first came to Congress. At that time the country criticized expenditures of $180,000,000 for the Army and Navy. So in the years that I have served, we have increased the appropriation for the Army and Navy over 400 per cent, notwithstanding the fact that these very gentlemen, these Army and Navy men, are the first to criticize any Member who does not vote for every increase and appropriation which they advocate. They are not sincere, they are not loyal, they are not patriotic; but they should be. If there is a class in America that should be patriotic, that should be loyal to the flag and to the country, it is this group of gentlemen, and at a time like this they should be the first to aid in bringing about conditions that may, at least to some extent, enable the Congress to balance the Budget, which, as I stated, I feel it is almost impossible for us to do at this time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Since my State and my craft have come into this debate so prominently in the last few minutes, Mr. Chairman, I feel it is only justifiable, not only to the gentlemen who sit in the press gallery above the Speaker but to the people who own the newspapers of the United States, that I may say a word, not necessarily in defense of them at all but in explanation.

Until I came to this House that had been the business at which I had made my livelihood, and I feel that I know something about the methods by which they work.

A surprisingly large percentage of the statements published in the press, well up in the nineties, are absolutely and strictly true. I have watched the press during the last few weeks in connection with its criticism of Congress, and what the press has done was not to say that Congress has done so-and-so, except in their editorial columns, but they have quoted Members of the two Houses of Congress as saying so-and-so. The impression goes to the country that that is a thing the newspaper has said. What the newspapers say about Congress is very largely what we say about each other.

Mr. Chairman, a difficulty in the United States to-day is impassioned, unrestrained, and intemperate judgment and statement of person about person. It is going on not only here but throughout the Nation. There never was a moment, as far as I can find from my reading of history, when class feeling, when group feeling, when rivalry in trade were as bitter as they are to-day in this Nation. That is dangerous.

I believe that any man who rises either on this floor or any place in this Nation to turn class feeling to his own advantage is crucifying this country for his own selfishness. [Applause.]

We have to make economies here, and there is no question about it. Money can not be gotten to carry on this Government at the rate we were going, whether we like it or not. We have taken some responsibility by reducing appropriations. I feel that Congress should take a little more of the responsibility by creating an orderly method of doing it.

I want to say that the business men who are spreading gloom in this Nation, the so-called business leaders, in their efforts to pass a larger part, I believe, than is justifiable of the burdens of this situation to others are largely responsible for the difficulty. [Applause.]

Just to show you the fairness of the country, I went through a primary election last Tuesday. I went among the war veterans, who were asking me where I stood on the bonus, attended meetings, and frankly told them I did not think we could pay it at this time and explained why. I believe I got a majority of the votes in those meetings. I got approximately 3 to 1 of the votes in my district and ran well up among the leaders of my ticket.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman did not pussyfoot on the dry question?

Mr. WHITE. I did not.

Mr. SCHAFER. He took a straightforward position in favor of changing the present prohibition law?

Mr. WHITE. I did. I think that law is one of the dangers of the times. I think that law one of the most intemperate on our books. If we will be temperate in what we do and say, we will come out of our present difficulties unscathed. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words. I heartily indorse everything that was said by our distinguished friend from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], and our good friend from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] regarding the necessity of cutting governmental expenses, but there was one intimation made by our friend from Maine with which I can not agree. He intimated we must accept as fixed and unchangeable the so-called "fixed charges" against the Government—accept them as the fixed and as the unchangeable law of the Medes and Persians. Why, it is the fixed charges of the Government, if you please, which embrace a large part of the $4,000,000,000 Budget annually, that we must attack, that we must cut down, and that we must change if we expect to save our Government from bankruptcy. How would we ever get this Government back to normalcy financially unless we cut down those fixed charges?

There has been an attempt by your committee, and there has been an attempt by every subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations that has passed on every supply bill that has come upon this floor, in so far as they could do it under the Holman rule, to cut down the fixed charges. They can not cut very far, it is true, because they have to keep strictly within the Holman rule and proper limitations; but as far as they could go, without making the provisions subject to a point of order, our Appropriations Committee has cut down those fixed charges. Under the Holman rule this Subcommittee on Appropriations, that has brought you this Army bill, has proposed to cut down certain parts of the fixed charges on 2,000 surplus Army officers, and yet we find distinguished men on this floor——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And only 25 per cent of those fixed charges at that.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. We find distinguished ex-Army officers here, big generals——

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The gentleman is referring to me. Let me ask him a question.

Mr. BLANTON. One moment, please. We find them here fighting that proposition. My friend fought consolidation, but his fight on consolidation is just a temporary victory. Do you not know that the consolidation is going to be made ultimately and not very long from now? He can win against proper consolidations for a while but not for all time, as the interests of the people of the United States are going to require it ultimately.

These big generals, like our friend, General MARTIN, and our good friend from Illinois, General CHIPERFIELD, and our good friend from Connecticut, General Goss, and our friend, Mr. PARKER of Georgia—they are not going to stop this move to reduce the fixed charges.

I am going to vote with this committee all along the line to cut these fixed charges. The RECORD shows that we have over 5,000 surplus officers in the United States Army, above the average and proportion of the officers in every army in every nation of the world. Are you not willing to cut them down?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I can not.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BLANTON. I can not yield now. I have only five minutes.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I raise the question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not take the gentleman from Texas off the floor on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. If the gentleman will not yield, I move that his remarks be taken down.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks that the remarks of the gentleman from Texas be taken down.

Mr. BLANTON. Which remarks does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. The remarks made about me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend. The Clerk will take down the reference.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I have reference, sir, to the remarks the gentleman has already made about me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will be seated.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that the gentleman from Texas was out of order and has asked that his words be taken down. The reference made to the gentleman from Georgia was made some moments ago and the gentleman from Texas has proceeded since then in debate. I think the point of order of the gentleman from Georgia comes too late. I only say this in order to preserve the procedure on this very delicate rule we have in the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from New York that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER] was evidently on his feet trying to get recognition. The Chair supposed he was going to ask the gentleman from Texas to yield until the gentleman from Georgia made the point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the Chair pleases, the gentleman from Georgia waived that privilege when he asked the gentleman from Texas to yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will hear me for a moment, I think the question involved in a matter of this sort is in the nature of a question of privilege, and there ought not be too strict or too meticulous a construction of the question raised by the gentleman from New York. The gentleman from Georgia might not have taken advantage of his rights at the time. I think the point of order certainly does not come too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of that opinion, in view of the fact that the gentleman was on his feet and the Chair was not advised of the purpose for which the gentleman desired recognition. The Chair asked if the gentleman from Texas would yield, and when the gentleman declined to yield, after that inquiry was made by the Chair, the gentleman from Texas said he declined to yield, and the gentleman from Georgia made the point of order and asked that the words be taken down. This is the recollection of the Chair of the proceedings.

Will the gentleman from Georgia indicate, for the information of the Chair, the words objected to?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I object to the language used by the gentleman from Texas wherein he refers to me as "General PARKER, the gentleman from Georgia, who won the war."

Mr. BLANTON. If that is all, I withdraw that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. He can not withdraw it, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The language can only be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that reference to the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, it is highly unfortunate that the House and the Members treat as a matter of levity a remark that was intended to be so unkind.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD]. We are not here to be lectured by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the words taken down.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that, pending the disposition of this precise matter, no other business can possibly take place on the floor of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order and has been endeavoring to suspend further proceedings.

The Clerk will report the words indicated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER].

The Clerk read the words referring to Mr. PARKER.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules the committee rises and reports the matter to the House.

The committee will rise.

The committee rose; and Mr. BANKHEAD, Speaker pro tempore, having assumed the chair, Mr. LANHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 11897, certain words, used in debate, were objected to and upon request were taken down and read at the Clerk's desk, and he herewith reported the same to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the words reported from the committee.

The Clerk read the words referring to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, if I am correct, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER] only objected to and requested that the words about him be taken down, and not anything that was said about the other gentlemen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can take no official cognizance of anything except the words that have been officially taken down and reported.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the words that have been taken down——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia that the preliminary question for the Chair to decide is whether or not the words taken down are opprobrious or in contravention of the rules of the House and of orderly debate. The statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has been reported by the Clerk and is now before the House for consideration.

The present occupant of the chair, of course, regrets personally that he is called upon to make a decision affecting this matter, because the Chair can readily understand how the words in question may have been construed to disparage the gentleman from Georgia, but it is only the duty of the Chair, under the circumstances, to undertake to construe, from a parliamentary standpoint, whether or not the words used are offensive in their nature or tend to bring the gentleman from Georgia into contempt or disrepute before the House.

However much the Chair would like to have an expression of the House on this language that has been taken down, the Chair is compelled to come to the conclusion that the language in itself does not offend the rules.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the possibility of a different construction being put upon the language, I join in the request of the gentleman from Texas that unanimous consent be given that the words be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. That request has not yet been made in the House.

Mr. McSWAIN. Then I make the request now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object, if the gentleman from Georgia says he did not win the war; I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Texas does not lose the floor?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee will resume its session.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have not crossed swords with the gentleman from Georgia with whom I have always been friends. My only reference to him was because of his attitude, principally in the Committee on Military Affairs. I have been trying to get the rottenness out of the Veterans' Bureau in order to balance the Budget, to get the graft and extravagance out of that bureau. I had before the Military Affairs Committee a witness——

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that I may revise and extend my remarks, and I will get further time later.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

WELFARE OF ENLISTED MEN

For the equipment and conduct of school, reading, lunch, and amusement rooms, service clubs, chapels, gymnasiums, and libraries, including periodicals and other publications and subscriptions for newspapers, salaries of civilians employed in the hostess and library services, transportation of books and equipment for these services, rental of films, purchase of slides for and making repairs to moving-picture outfits, and for similar and other recreational purposes at training and mobilization camps now established or which may be hereafter established, $69,540.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 15, strike out "$69,540" and insert in lieu thereof "$40,000."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to the fact that this paragraph carries appropriations for recreational purposes. It is solely for recreation, and provides $69,540, a reduction from last year of only $2,000. Last year we appropriated $72,640. I submit that while Congress is being hard driven for economy, here is a good place to save $29,000. My amendment will do that. Here we have a body of men that are well fed—they have better food than they have ever had before in the Army.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have improved in the last 15 or 20 years owing to the cook schools and care planning for food, and this body of men is well housed and well clothed, and it has the best of medical care. In fact, they enjoy all the comforts of life.

When I was a boy at an Army post, in the early days, as General MARTIN will recall, recreation was paid for out of the company funds.

This appropriation is also for books and newspapers. In my day it was paid for out of the company funds. Here we have civilian employees, and hostess, and library service. Surely, in every company there are one or two able to do library work.

I submit, that in view of the very earnest demands that have been made for economy, surely we can strike $29,000 from this item.

I do not make this as a pro forma amendment. I want to say to-day to my distinguished colleague from Georgia [Mr. PARKER] and our colleague from Oregon that they must not take darts coming from a heated debate too much at heart.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I would not take anything at heart that came from the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am serious. We have a bitter debate every year on the military appropriation bill, and we must go through with it as a part of our work. We have two different schools of thought in this country on military appropriations, and because some of us take a stand on this question, I do not think any Member should take it as a personal affront.

Personally I am glad that we have the Army viewpoint reflected here by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN]. I think that is helpful. I think it carries out our idea of representative government. I appeal to my friend from Oregon—he and I do not always agree, but I know he takes his work seriously—so may I suggest to him that it is all a part of our day's work and he should not feel offended if some of us differ with him.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The gentleman must know that I am not supersensitive, and he should not worry about that. I have just as thick a hide, probably, as my distinguished friend has, and I will take just as much part in a scrimmage as he will. I am not sensitive about this. I do not care what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] says or what anybody else says. I maintain my own views and my own opinion.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is entitled to that.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. And do not think that I am one of these sensitive, delicate little plants; I am as tough as hell. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am glad to hear that the gentleman is hard-boiled. Now, to get back to my amendment for a moment, I submit this is something that the enlisted men themselves can provide their own recreation and take care of their own libraries. We ought to take at least the $29,000 off this item that I suggest. I appeal to my colleagues who were so strong for economy when it was a matter of reducing the salaries of civil-service employees. As we go along I am going to impose on the patience of the House and point out where economies may be made without impairing national defense one bit. Our whole national defense always has depended upon a citizen army, and yet we have built up this appropriation and seen it grow in the last 14 years from before the war until we have this gigantic costly machine that it is almost impossible to break through. I appeal to my colleague, who seems to be so strong for economy, to start right here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this amendment. The provision in the bill is just what it says. It is $69,540, which it is proposed to appropriate for the welfare of enlisted men. This appropriation provides books for their libraries, reading material, newspapers, magazines, amusement rooms for the men, moving-picture outfits, and other supplies which they use in a recreational way. I visited one of these libraries not so long ago at an Army post and was surprised when the corporal in charge told me of the number of books and the class of books that were taken out of that library and read by the enlisted men. Many of them were books of a scientific nature. He told me that at that post there were many enlisted men who were trying to improve themselves, trying to learn trades, so that they would be prepared to take better positions in civilian life when their enlistments expired. Many of the books read by the men were similar to reference books used by students in college. This is for the welfare of the enlisted men. I submit that this House does not want to curtail in any way this small appropriation for these men, many of whom are at out-of-the-way posts, places where other amusement and entertainment can not be had.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. How many of these posts are there?

Mr. BARBOUR. I can not tell the gentleman. I presume the number is in the hearings. There is a large number of them.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Can the gentleman give us some idea as to the number and the necessity for the expense?

Mr. BARBOUR. We have Army posts scattered all over the United States, in the Philippines, and in Panama, and in Hawaii, and various places. In the Canal Zone there are several different posts. The total number of posts in the United States I can not tell offhand.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. About 200.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have out of this appropriation the amount of $24,380 estimated for pay and travel of hostesses, and then we have pay and traveling expenses of librarians, purchase of books, and so forth; and transportation of books and equipment, $45,260, and purchase and repair of recreational equipment, $1,000.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN] says there are 200 of those posts where this work is carried on.

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes. If General MARTIN says that, it is true; I have no doubt that is the number.

Mr. Chairman, these hostesses have been carried in the Army for a long period of time. They are women at the Army posts who meet the families of the enlisted men when they come there to visit them. They look after them and they care for them. There are only 13 of them all together. They serve a useful purpose in that and other ways.

Now, there is a librarian in each corps area. That corps-area librarian sometimes must travel to other posts in the corps area. For that reason there is a small amount included here for travel of librarians. The larger part of the item is for the purchase of books.

With that statement to the House explaining just what this item is, I am willing to submit the matter.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. KETCHAM. In line 13 there is reference to "recreation purposes at training and mobilization camps."

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. I am wondering if the total has been written with the idea that the training and mobilization camps may be eliminated this summer?

Mr. BARBOUR. No.

Mr. KETCHAM. If that is true, the item is not large at all.

Mr. BARBOUR. There was a small reduction in the Budget, and then there was another cut made by the committee. It was reduced from $72,640 to $69,540. The Budget reduced it $2,000 and the committee reduced it another $1,000.

Mr. KETCHAM. With the suggestion of the gentleman, it seems to me that item is not excessive.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLANTON: On page 8, line 4, strike out the words "welfare of enlisted men."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I maintain that the welfare of enlisted men does not require so many ex-major generals on the floor of the House of Representatives going into a huddle to break up a committee bill.

This is not the first time I have put General CHIPERFIELD and General PARKER into a huddle. I have had them in a huddle before the Committee on Military Affairs for the last three weeks.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. It seems to me that the bill should be discussed and not personalities in the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am discussing the welfare of enlisted men as against generals in a huddle.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman from Texas has no right to allude to Members by mentioning their names. The gentleman must state "the gentleman from such and such a State" and "the gentleman from such and such a State."

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The rules require reference to Members in the third person.

Mr. BLANTON. I think that point of order is well taken, Mr. Chairman.

I have had a bill before the Committee on Military Affairs to clean up this Veterans' Bureau in the interest of the enlisted men and the taxpayers of the United States. Incidental to it I have been trying to remove this swivel-chair officer, William Wolff Smith, who served 13 days before the armistice and who is drawing a salary of $9,000 and also retired pay of $187.50 per month additional.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the bill is not being discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am discussing my amendment, "the welfare of the enlisted men."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, Members of Congress can hardly be considered enlisted men. The gentleman from Texas will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, there is a bunch of men here who were enlisted at one time and they are not enlisted now, except against my proposal to clean up the Veterans' Bureau. I showed before this committee that 876 "lawyerettes" are employed by the Veterans' Bureau at salaries ranging from $2,500 to $9,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the gentleman from Texas speak on the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like one gentleman at a time to rise against me. I can take care of all three of the generals if the House will allow me to do it.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I do not think the House will allow the gentleman to do it.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is so used to giving orders that he does not like to take them, but here in the House of Representatives he does, for we are all equal. I do not have to salute him at all.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I have gotten under your hide, and that is exactly what I wanted to do.

Mr. BLANTON. I am getting under the General's hide, too, and he can not stand it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, proceeding in order, if these generals will allow me, I showed that this William Wolff Smith swore falsely to an affidavit to get his big retired pay.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the gentleman speak in order on this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I am speaking in order, under the heading of "The Welfare of the Enlisted Men." It is the enlisted men of the Nation, 4,000,000 of them, whose money is being spent by such parasite grafters as William Wolff Smith.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will suspend until the point of order is disposed of.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment that has been made at this point in this bill. If we can not, in this House of Representatives, attend to our business and discuss the things before us, we will never get through.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from Texas will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. I am proceeding in order, Mr. Chairman. I know the rules of the House. In behalf of the enlisted men I was trying to get this parasite off. I showed that he has made an affidavit that for the six months just before he entered the Army he was getting $600 a month from a private law practice, while in truth and in fact he was employed as a clerk in the War Department at a salary of only $125 per month, which he admitted under oath while testifying before the committee. When his secretary was testifying before the committee, I made her admit that she also made an affidavit to this application of Smith's, in which she swore that the facts stated therein by him were true and correct. And the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER] asserted that he could see no relevancy of the testimony; that it was unimportant; and that if the committee permitted me to offer such testimony, he would refuse to attend the committee hearings. It would be no great loss to the country if he did quit attending.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will kindly proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. I am, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TABER. The gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I know the rules of the House. I have a right to discuss my subject, which is the enlisted men of the Army. There is a certain amount of latitude allowed in debate on the floor. This is the open forum for us Representatives of the people, and I have a right, on behalf of the 400,000 people I represent, to tell these generals something in the interest of the enlisted men.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes that there is latitude in debate, but the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I do not yield. I want to use the rest of my five minutes. I have not been able to use much of it yet. There are too many generals interfering with me.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield to a buck private?

Mr. BLANTON. Always in the interest of a buck private; yes. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, will he remove his alleged parasite from the disabled emergency officers' retirement roll?

Mr. BLANTON. I think the committee is going to do that in a week.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman is merely laying his foundation in the matter and feels he is proceeding in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. The committee, I hope, is going to do it in less than a week.

Mr. SCHAFER. In view of that I will not ask the gentleman any more questions.

Mr. BLANTON. I had the false affidavit of William Wolff Smith wherein he had sworn that for six months he was getting $600 per month, while in fact he was getting only $125, and certain obstructionists could not see the relevancy of it.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment pending before the committee.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas proceed out of order for three minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to proceed in order. I know my rights here in the House, and I do not need the gentleman from New York to tell me how to proceed in the interest of the welfare of the enlisted men. I say that this general counsel had made a false affidavit. He had his secretary up there, who had been raised from a $1,400 clerk to a $4,800 lawyer in a few years. She had sworn, too, that the facts in that false statement were true and correct. Then I had these generals huddling—the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Georgia. They said they would quit the committee if I were allowed to put that evidence in in behalf of the enlisted men whom I was trying to serve. They were huddling there and they have been huddling here, but they are not going to stop me until I clean up that Veterans' Bureau. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, that was a pro forma amendment, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. From the standpoint of the welfare of the enlisted men I believe the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] would be rendering better service for those who are now in the establishment and those who might enter the establishment and serve in a time of a future war if he would confine his work and service during the consideration of this bill to aiding in striking out some of its indefensible provisions, which practically emasculate our national-defense policy.

The chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee recommends drastic changes. He outlined in his speeches his defense of some of the monstrosities included in this bill. He indicated that the authority that he was following was the views of a major and a captain in the British service.

Members of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, before you follow and vote with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] pay a little heed and attention to American citizens, the generals and other qualified staff officers of the American Army who will have to fight our battles if in the future we should engage in a war with a foreign country. Perhaps the country to which the British major and captain whom the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] has quoted as authority owe allegiance. Such a thing is not utterly impossible. Why should the American Congress on a matter of our national defense follow some of the ridiculous proposals incorporated in this bill because some British captain or major advocates them? If we should adopt some of the proposals suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi, we might as well follow more of the British theory from a national-defense standpoint. If we should follow the suggestions made by this British major and this British captain, we might as well provide that before breakfast every morning every red-blooded American in the United States Army should rise up in all majesty and sing the British tune, "God Save the King."

Great Britain now has 22,332 officers and 401,758 enlisted men in her active regular army service. France has 32,317 officers and 598,042 enlisted men in her active regular army service. America has 12,000 officers and 118,750 enlisted men in her active Regular Army service. And yet in these days of unrest we are asked to reduce our 12,000 officer personnel by 2,000.

Gentlemen, pause before you, in the name of economy, in these days of unrest among the nations of the world, strike a vital blow at our national defense. Bear in mind that if you do help balance the Budget at this time by decreasing the effectiveness of the American Army, what will it avail you and the people of America if in the future, by reason of your penurious attitude, the whole Nation should be overcome and destroyed and the people of our common country required to pay many hundred times the saving in a tax tribute to a foreign nation. Consider the history of the world, and such a happening is not impossible. We sincerely hope that the day never comes when we must fight another war. We must, however, face facts and not hopes and should be prepared, particularly while other nations are arming to the teeth, with Asiatic nations beginning the next war and European nations refusing to reduce armaments.

Mr. Chairman, in order to balance the Budget it is not necessary to save a few million dollars at the expense of the security of our Nation and her people. If you are sincere in desiring to balance the Budget without a levy of burdensome taxes, I would suggest that you read and follow that noble editorial appearing in the Washington News, a Scripps-Howard newspaper, on yesterday, May 12, 1932, entitled "Do it now."

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point by inserting the editorial in question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

DO IT NOW

Wet victories in the Ohio and Indiana primaries hasten the national march away from prohibition. Ohio, the mother of Presidents and mother of the Anti-Saloon League, is a key State. Indiana is the State that had the most drastic dry laws.

This general reaction against an experiment which started with noble purpose and ended ignobly is now barbed with sharp economic necessity. Prohibition enforcement swells the Federal deficit and at the same time robs the Government of revenue with which to balance the Budget and relieve the overburdened taxpayer.

Those hit by the tax bill are now asking to be spared. The movies, the rubber industry, the automobile industry, the insurance companies—the whole long list.

And make no mistake about it, they are hit, and hit hard—at a time when any extra expense whatsoever is an inch off the end of the nose.

Life or death for many of the industries is in the provisions of the tax bill; life if the tax is only all that the traffic will bear; the death sentence if beyond that. And the death means to the Government that the goose that lays the golden egg is no more, that the thing the bill seeks to accomplish is nullified by the bill itself. So it is no more than natural and human that cries for mercy are raised.

And while all this is going on, the thing which would relieve all, the thing which would save industry from being taxed to death, lies before us—unused.

Congress, the Congress which is doing the taxing, has the power to amend the Volstead Act. By such an amendment a tax on beer can be levied. And by such a tax the terrible burden could be lightened, could be shifted to shoulders that could bear it—shoulders that now go unencumbered with any load whatsoever.

A beer tax would bring in from $375,000,000 to $500,000,000 per year. Think what that would do! It is a greater sum than the present proposed taxes on amusements, radios and phonographs, and communications combined. It is from one-third to one-half the total tax bill.

* * * * * * *

What a silly situation!

Prohibition is doomed. Every sign points to that fact. As sure as the stars prohibition is on the way out. Every politician in Washington knows it. It is only a matter of time. In what amounts to a stampede the political drys are turning wet.

What an opportunity to do it now—now, when the awful pressure of taxation can be relieved—not later, when the death sentence on overtaxed Americans has been executed.

Those industries which are now crying for help have stockholders. Those stockholders are voters. We advise the ones who are now lobbying in Washington to get their companies spared to go to the grass roots—to call upon their stockholders to express themselves to their Congressmen and their Senators.

Amendment of the Volstead Act by this Congress would turn the trick. It would clear the skies. It isn't being done because the wary politicians are waiting for the party conventions next month to take the responsibility for something that is an inevitable as to-morrow.

But pressure from back home might change their minds. The politician, admitting that prohibition is doomed, contends that it "can't be done in this session." He can be made to understand that anything is possible in a time like this.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, this editorial truthfully shows how we can bring into the badly battered Federal Treasury from $375,000,000 to $500,000,000 each year. Instead of trying to wreck our national defense in order to save a few million dollars, I ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] and those following him in the name of economy, in the name of the Treasury, and in the name of the taxpayers, to walk up to the Clerk's desk and add their names to the petition which aims to bring the beer bill before the House for consideration. I also ask the distinguished Speaker of the House [Mr. GARNER] to do the same thing. He is the Speaker, but he came down in the well of the House and talked about the sales tax provision of the revenue bill in the name of the Treasury and in the name of economy and in the name of the taxpayers.

Hon. William Randolph Hearst, the publisher of many newspapers in this Nation, who has been a leader in behalf of maintaining an adequate national defense and the strongest supporter of the Speaker for the Presidency of the United States, is also one of the pioneers in advocating sensible prohibition reform as mentioned in the editorial incorporated in my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, no Member of this House can return and face the people in his or her district and convince them that they are for economy, for reduction in the cost of government, and reduction of burdensome taxes if they fail to assist in the enactment of a real economy bill as mentioned in the editorial.

You know that since the Judiciary Committee has failed to report the beer bill favorably that the only way it can be brought before the House in this session for consideration and passage is via the discharge rule. The discharge petition only lacks a few of the necessary 145 votes. So all you Members who have not already signed it and who believe in economy from the taxpayers' standpoint better get busy and affix your signatures if you are for the proposition. If you do not you must be against it.

The Lord said, according to St. Matthew xii, 30:

He that is not with Me is against Me; and he that gathereth not with Me scattereth abroad.

So you digest this wonderful editorial appearing in the Washington News, which you have so graciously allowed to be embodied as a part of my remarks, I hope we may have a stampede to sign the discharge petition on the beer bill and then when it is considered in the House assist in its passage without any unnecessary delay and send it to the Senate and let the economy doctors in that body who weep in behalf of the taxpayers and the battered Treasury pass and send it on to the White House. I feel confident that in these days of verily bleeding and dying in the name of economy, the taxpayers, and the Treasury that the President who is now in the White House will take his pen in hand and sign it within a few minutes after he receives it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin, whom I admire for having been a "buck private" in the war, yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The last stampede of that kind to the Clerk's desk we had in the House, to sign such a petition, was pretty disastrous for some of the stampeders.

Mr. SCHAFER. At the elections next fall it will be disastrous to many of the drys who fail to sign. Oh, your leader from Texas, the father of the eighteenth amendment, and the other prohibition leaders told us about the wonderful prosperity the eighteenth amendment would bring and had favored the American people with. They claimed only two or three years ago that the increased ownership of homes, life insurance, building and loan investments, fat pay envelopes, and many other prosperity benefits had accrued to the American workers and farmers and to all the people of the Nation as a result of the eighteenth amendment and prohibition. What are you going to say about it to-day? You followed him several years ago and preached the same doctrine. Do you admit that the prosperity which we do not have to-day is the result of prohibition? [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

FINANCE DEPARTMENT

PAY, ETC., OF THE ARMY

For pay of commissioned officers of the line and staff, $27,209,927; pay of officers, National Guard, $100; pay of warrant officers, $1,657,205; aviation increase to commissioned and warrant officers of the Army, not to exceed $1,754,283; additional pay to officers for length of service, $8,356,200; pay of enlisted men of the line and staff, not including the Philippine Scouts, $53,026,611; pay of enlisted men of National Guard, $100; aviation increase to enlisted men of the Army, $583,279; pay of enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts, $1,050,446; additional pay for length of service to enlisted men, $3,667,172; pay of the officers on the retired list, $12,914,948; pay of retired enlisted men, $12,252,603; pay of retired pay clerks, $3,375; pay not to exceed 60 civil-service messengers at $1,200 each at headquarters of the several Territorial departments, corps areas, Army and corps headquarters, Territorial districts, tactical divisions and brigades, service schools, camps, and ports of embarkation and debarkation, $72,000; pay and allowances of contract surgeons, $51,276; pay of nurses, $852,080; pay of hospital matrons, $600; rental allowances, including allowances for quarters for enlisted men on duty where public quarters are not available, $4,648,006; subsistence allowances, $5,122,479; interest on soldiers' deposits, $30,000; payment of exchange by officers serving in foreign countries, and when specially authorized by the Secretary of War, by officers disbursing funds pertaining to the War Department, when serving in Alaska, and all foreign money received shall be charged to and paid out by disbursing officers of the Army at the legal valuation fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, $100; in all, $133,257,790, less $800,000 to be supplied by the Secretary of War for this purpose from funds received during the fiscal year 1933 from the purchase by enlisted men of the Army of their discharges, $132,457,790; and the money herein appropriated for "Pay, etc., of the Army" shall be accounted for as one fund: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available to pay any officer detailed as a military aide to any civil officer of the United States outside of the War Department except the President: Provided further, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available for or on account of the maintenance of more than 50 military attachés: Provided further, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available for or on account of the maintenance of more than 83 bands: Provided further, That during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, no officer of the Army shall be entitled to receive an addition to his pay in consequence of the provisions of the act approved May 11, 1908 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 803): Provided further, That after September 30, 1932, the sum herein appropriated for the pay of officers shall not be used for the pay of more than 10,000 commissioned officers on the active list of the Regular Army: Provided further, That after September 30, 1932, the number of officers of the line and promotion-list officers on the active list of the Regular Army shall not exceed 8,930, to be distributed among the following grades in the proportion now authorized by law, namely: 17 in the grade of major general, 37 in the grade of brigadier general, 384 in the grade of colonel, 473 in the grade of lieutenant colonel, 1,411 in the grade of major, and 2,822 in the grade of captain, and in the grades of first and second lieutenant the total number shall not exceed 3,786: Provided further, That hereafter no promotion shall be made to fill a vacancy in any of the several grades designated unless such promotion be necessary within the number of such grade as herein prescribed: Provided further, That upon the approval of this act, the President shall convene a board of not less than five general officers on the active list of the Regular Army who shall select the officers to be removed from the active list in consequence hereof, and the action of such board as to the number of and persons to be removed from the active list and the priority of their removal, except as to general officers, shall be final. Selections of general officers shall be subject to the approval of the President. Selections in the grades of second lieutenant to colonel, both inclusive, shall be confined to officers in such grades most advanced in age, except (1) that the board may exempt not to exceed 5 per cent of the total number of officers most advanced in age in each of such grades and, in addition, such Air Corps officers whose retirement may not be approved by the Chief of the Army Air Corps, and exercise its discretion in the selection of other officers in lieu thereof, and (2) that the board may exempt completely officers in the grade of second lieutenant. In addition to such selections, the board also shall select such further number of officers most advanced in age from the grades of colonel and lieutenant colonel, to be removed from the active list on or before May 31, 1933, as will provide vacancies within the total number of 8,930 line and promotion-list officers for the class of cadets graduating from the Military Academy in the month of June, 1933: Provided further, That to the extent the total number of line and promotion-list officers selected for retirement in consequence hereof, exclusive of those selected to create vacancies for graduates of the Military Academy, shall be less than 2,000, the board shall select for retirement, at its discretion, such number of non-promotion-list officers as will equal such shortage: Provided further, That all officers selected for removal from the active list in consequence hereof shall be placed on the unlimited retired list with pay at the rate of 75 per cent of active pay.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the language in the bill, commencing at line 19, page 10, down to the end of the paragraph in line 20, page 12, on the ground that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from California kindly point out specifically what portions of the paragraph alluded to he has reference to or whether he has reference to the entire paragraph?

Mr. BARBOUR. I have reference to the entire portion of the paragraph as indicated for the reason that it all depends upon the first part of the proviso beginning in line 19, page 10.

Mr. BYRNS. If the gentleman will permit, does the gentleman's point of order go to the entire paragraph?

Mr. BARBOUR. No; not to the entire paragraph. It goes to the language relating to the number of officers that shall hereafter be in the Army.

In line 19, commencing with the words—

Provided further, That after September 30, 1932, the number of officers of the line and promotion-list officers on the active list of the Regular Army shall not exceed 8,930, to be distributed among the following grades in the proportion now authorized by law, namely: Seventeen in the grade of major general, 37 in the grade of brigadier general, 384 in the grade of colonel, 473 in the grade of lieutenant colonel, 1,411 in the grade of major, and 2,822 in the grade of captain, and in the grades of first and second lieutenant the total number shall not exceed 3,786.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a change in the statutory law which provides the number of officers of these various grades that there shall be in the Army.

The national defense act, section 4, of the copy which I have in my hand, provides——

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from California the code citation?

Mr. BARBOUR. It is the act of June 4, 1920. The code citation does not appear here.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question in order that the record may be made up on the facts? Can the gentleman state to the Chair, upon his point of order, the number of enlisted personnel authorized under existing law?

Mr. BARBOUR. That has nothing to do with it. The gentleman said the enlisted personnel.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did that improvidently. I meant the commissioned personnel. Under existing law what is the authorized number of commissioned officers that this provision is seeking to reduce?

Mr. BARBOUR. I am coming to that now.

The act of June 4, 1920, provides, in section 4:

Officers commissioned to and holding in the Army the office of a general officer shall hereafter be known as general officers of the line; officers commissioned to and holding in the Army an office other than that of a general officer, but to which the rank of a general officer is attached, shall be known as general officers of the staff. There shall be one general as now authorized by law until a vacancy occurs in that office, after which it shall cease to exist.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am coming to the language involved here:

On and after July 1, 1920, there shall be 21 major generals and 46 brigadier generals of the line, 599 colonels, 674 lieutenant colonels, 2,245 majors, 4,490 captains, 4,266 first lieutenants, 2,694 second lieutenants, and also the number of officers of the medical department and chaplains hereinafter provided for, professors as now authorized by law, and the present military storekeeper, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a major; and the numbers herein prescribed shall not be exceeded.

That is the basic law, Mr. Chairman, upon which these appropriations are made.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How many officers in number does that provide for?

Mr. BARBOUR. I think about 15,000.

Mr. JAMES. About 12,000.

Mr. BARBOUR. This provision to which my point of order is directed does not relate to the fiscal year of 1933, but it is for all time—

That after September 30, 1932, the number of officers of the line and promotion-list officers on the active list of the Regular Army shall not exceed 8,930, to be distributed among the following grades in the proportion now authorized by law, namely, 17 in the grade of major general, 37 in the grade of brigadier general, 384 in the grade of colonel—

And then it goes on and prescribes the number for each grade.

Now, being applicable to all succeeding fiscal years, and not being confined to the fiscal year 1933, it is my contention that this is not a limitation on an appropriation bill, but is legislation.

I find that the rule in this regard was very clearly stated by Chairman Frederick C. Hicks, on January 8, 1923, where he laid down certain tests to determine whether a provision in an appropriation bill was legislation on an appropriation bill.

Chairman Hicks said:

Without endeavoring to lay down any hard-and-fast rule, the Chair feels that the following tests may be helpful in deciding a question of order directed against a limitation, first having determined the powers granted or the duties imposed by existing laws: Does the limitation apply solely to the appropriation under consideration? Does it operate beyond the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made?

And then, in conclusion, after stating other tests which do not directly apply in this case. He says:

If the limitation will not fairly stand these tests, then the point of order should be sustained.

It is my contention, Mr. Chairman, that this provision in the bill does not stand the test that it must not operate beyond the fiscal year over which the appropriation is made.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I am informed that the act now in force with reference to the number of officers in the Army is the section contained in the Army appropriation act of June 30, 1922, which will be found in 42 Statutes at Large, page 721.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman is mistaken about that. It has been modified.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What is the later modification?

Mr. COLLINS. September 14, 1922, and also the act of 1921.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I was coming to that. I have before me also the act of September 14, 1922, section 1, which will be found in 42 Statutes, page 840, which is an amendment to the provision of the Army appropriation act of June 30, 1922. Subsequently the number of promotion-list officers was increased by 403 in the Air Corps, by section 8, of the act of July 2, 1926, creating the Air Corps.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will permit, the Chair wants the United States citation. It is Title X, sections 481, 482, down.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that it will be argued that this legislation is in order under the Holman rule inasmuch as upon its face it reduces the number of officers of the line and promotion list on the active list of the Regular Army. The Holman rule, however, requires that legislation, to be in order under it, shall upon its face show retrenchment. While the Holman rule does permit legislation, the legislation must show retrenchment upon its face so clearly that the Chair upon the reading of the language may conclude that the language will provide a reduction in expenditures. I submit to the Chair that the reading of the language now in question can by no means clearly bring to the mind of the Chair any such conclusion.

It is true that the number of officers of the line and promotion list is specifically placed at 8,930, to be distributed in the manner which the bill recites is in accordance with the proportion now authorized by law; but, in addition to that provision, there is a provision for the convening of a board of general officers by the President who shall determine upon the manner in which selections of officers for removal shall be made, and at the very conclusion of the language involved in the objection of the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] it is provided:

That all officers selected for removal from the active list in consequence hereof shall be placed on the unlimited retired list with pay at the rate of 75 per cent of active pay.

I respectfully submit to the Chair that whether there will be any saving in placing officers upon the unlimited retired list with pay at the rate of 75 per cent of active pay, as against keeping those officers or other officers actually in the Army in active service, is a matter of pure speculation. It will depend upon the longevity pay as well as upon the base pay to which the officers selected for removal may be entitled, and the Chair can not determine whether reducing the number of officers in active service as provided in this language and thereafter reorganizing the Army and providing for filling their places and for retiring certain officers will result in any saving, retrenchment, or reduction of expenditures. I respectfully submit that the language must show affirmatively upon its face, under the Holman rule, that actual retrenchment and reduction in expenditures will follow.

There are portions of this language which I think clearly would be out of order without reference to the general purpose of the entire scheme. For instance, the provision for convening a board of five general officers by the President, who shall select the officers to be removed, is legislation which is not at all necessary for the purpose of carrying out a reduction in the number of officers. However, I shall not press that point, because I am informed that if the language involved in the point of order is to remain in the bill it will be necessary to have some such provision as this to make it at all workable. But it does not follow from any of the language to which objection has been made that there will be retrenchment or actual reduction of the total cost as a result of these changes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The Chair, of course, is supposed to know, and does know, the pay of these officers who are to be retired. It seems to me that it is very simple and very plain that if you are to put on the retired list these officers on three-quarters of their full pay, as many as 2,000 of them, it means retrenchment, so that the language on its face evidently carries with it the idea of retrenchment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Apparently this procedure of reducing the number of officers of the Army is so simple that a very cumbersome and very complicated piece of machinery has been provided for its accomplishment, and what the result of that accomplishment will be the Chair can not now determine. This board to be convened by the President will take the action which will determine whether the officers who are retired and who are to be paid thereafter 75 per cent of their active pay will have such service both in grade and with reference to longevity that actually there will be a saving in the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the general appropriation bills and therefore comes within the purview of Rule XXI, which prohibits legislation on an appropriation bill. If this provision against which the point of order is made is legislation, then it is subject to the point of order. The gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] clearly shows that beyond peradventure of a doubt it is legislation on an appropriation bill. We concede that. But, Mr. Chairman, in the rules there is a notable exception to Rule XXI, the excepting rule being the only rule in our entire system of procedure which bears the name of its author, the Holman rule. The Holman rule provides that, although a provision may be legislation on an appropriation bill, still, if germane, it is in order, provided it reduces the number or salaries of officials of the Government, or that it reduces compensation received from the Government, or that it reduces the total amounts charged against the Treasury.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course, the gentleman concedes that it must be with the result of making retrenchment or reduction of expenditures.

Mr. CANNON. It can hardly comply with these provisions unless it does do so. That necessarily follows.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is a sine qua non. It must reduce expenses.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, although this is legislation on an appropriation bill, it is in order if it reduces the salary and number of officers, if it reduces compensation, or if it reduces the amount chargeable against the Treasury. Mr. Chairman, it does all three.

As shown by the statute cited by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR], the number of officers fixed by statute is vastly in excess of the limitation fixed in this appropriation. In other words, this provision means a reduction of the officers of the Army by 2,000 men. That is self-evident. It is a matter of common knowledge. That is the reason for opposing it. That is the very reason it is not wanted, because it does reduce the officers of the Army by 2,000 men.

Then it follows, Mr. Chairman, if we reduce the number of officers of the Army we save the Treasury the amount of their salaries. We save the Treasury the amount of their allowances and their subsistence; we save the Treasury the amount of their travel allowance, forage, and all the other incidental expenses which the support of every officer necessarily charges against the Treasury.

There remains, then, Mr. Chairman, only one consideration, the last one mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM], that the bill provides for the method by which the number of officers shall be reduced—the appointment of a board by the President. The gentleman submits that this is legislation which does not necessarily involve a reduction in expenditures.

It is well established in the law of the House that in providing a method for retrenchment every component part, every integral provision, every essential step shall be considered together as one provision. It can not be picked apart and taken sentence by sentence or item by item. That requirement applies to the pending provision. It is a method which must be considered as a whole, a method of which any part is indispensable, a method which in operation will reduce expenditures and which, therefore, comes within the limit of the Holman rule.

Permit me to cite, Mr. Chairman, one or two notable instances in which rulings have been made on this point. Let us go back to the Sixty-fourth Congress, when we were considering the legislative appropriation bill. A proposition was made there to reduce by one-tenth all the employees in the departments of the Government and coupled with it was the proviso that the working day should be increased from seven hours to eight hours. A point of order was made that although the reduction of one-tenth in personnel would bring it within the Holman rule, the accompanying proposition that the hours of labor be increased from seven to eight was not essential and took it out of the provisions of the Holman rule. A man whose parliamentary knowledge I need not discuss here, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], presiding as chairman of the Committee of the Whole, held that while taken separately it might not contribute to retrenchment, it must be considered in connection with, and as a part of, the accompanying proposition; that the amendment must be considered as a whole, and was therefore in order under the provisions of the Holman rule.

Permit me to refer to another instance. In 1922, in the Sixty-eighth Congress, we were considering the counterpart of this very bill, the War Department appropriation bill. A proposition was made, almost identical with the proposition here, that we limit the number of men which might be provided for. It was provided that certain machinery be created to bring about this reduction—just as the appointment of this board is a part of the machinery here created to bring about this reduction.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman kindly give the Chair the citation?

Mr. CANNON. It is in the second volume, section 8579.

Mr. Nicholas Longworth, of Ohio, was presiding as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and he held—as Chairman CRISP had held before him—that when you consider the machinery by which a retrenchment is to be effected, you must consider it as a whole; you must consider each item as an integral part.

I shall only trespass on the time of the Chair for one more instance. In the Sixty-second Congress the War Department appropriation bill was under consideration. The bill carried a provision for retrenchment, which included, as a part of the machinery by which that retrenchment was to be achieved, the appointment of an officer with the rank of major general. The appointment was to be made by the President of the United States, just as the present bill provides for the creation of an agency to be appointed by the President of the United States—absolutely on all fours with the proposition now before the House. Mr. Saunders, of Virginia, made a lengthy decision, a very brief portion of which I desire to read to the Chair. He said, in section 8622:

> It is a constructive legislation in which each part bears an appropriate relation to the whole. It is an entity of independent but related parts. It is submitted as a complete legislative proposition. This being so it should be considered as a whole and not in segregated items. The section is presented as a whole, and when considered as a whole conforms to the requirements of the Holman rule, and is therefore in order.

That is precisely the proposition before the House, Mr. Chairman. The bill provides essential machinery for the reduction of the number of officers of the Army, thereby reducing personnel and retrenching expenditures, and as such it is admissible under the Holman rule, and is in order.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I want particularly to address my remarks to that part of the point of order directed against the second proviso on page 11, line 10, down to and through line 10 on page 12. I want to reply, in brief, to the remarks made by the gentleman from Missouri on this proviso which sets up a special board to bring about this reduction. It goes further, however, and provides that these officers shall be eliminated because of age, which is an entirely new proposal. The existing law gives the Army the right to-day to retire all class B officers for inefficiency.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. I did not hear the first part of the gentleman's remarks, but my impression is that the gentleman objects to providing that certain class officers or officers who reach a certain age, should be retired?

Mr. BACON. My main objection is that this proviso is not at all necessary; and that if a reduction of 2,000 officers is agreed on, they can be eliminated without this proviso. That being the case, it is not necessary to the section.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman hold it would not be in order to offer a proposal here to not provide for the payment of men who had reached a certain age?

Mr. BACON. My contention is that this suggests a special legislative way of retiring officers that is not necessary. Under existing law all class B officers can be eliminated without any further legislation whatsoever. By simply applying the existing law the Army can reduce officers by 2,000 without the necessity of the proviso on page 11, beginning on line 10, which is an entirely new proposition and legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman contend as a parliamentary proposition that it would not be in order to insert a provision that pay should be denied men who had reached a certain age?

Mr. BACON. I am not directing my remarks to that at all. I am directing my remarks to the fact that in this bill a special method is set up which is not necessary. Under existing law the Army can carry out to-day a reduction of 2,000 men or whatever number the committee decides upon without the necessity of this special board, as provided on page 11.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman understands, of course, that I have just cited the opinions of three of the ablest parliamentarians who have ever presided over the Committee of the Whole, Mr. CRISP, of Georgia, Mr. Saunders, of Virginia, and Mr. Longworth, of Ohio, holding such provisions are integral parts of the proposition; but if the gentleman contends that as a separate proposition you can not provide that men reaching a certain age might be retired, I will quote to the gentleman a favorite expression of a former leader on that side of the aisle, Mr. Mann, to the effect that under the rules you can make provision to eliminate the pay of any man who is red headed.

Mr. BACON. I am merely trying to answer the theory of the gentleman from Missouri to the effect that the proviso on page 11 is necessary to carry out the other provisos on page 10. I contend it is not necessary, because under existing law class B officers can be dismissed at the present moment, and the War Department can carry out the directions to cut the Army by 2,000 officers without recourse to the proviso on page 11, which changes existing law as to how officers may be eliminated from the Army.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. In volume 7 of the new series of Hinds' Precedents, paragraph 8610, the gentleman will find this proposition laid down, as stated in Cannon's Procedure, page 45:

> Provision for reduction of expenditures does not admit accompanying legislation not directly contributing to the reduction and essential to its operation.

In other words, while the Holman rule would permit a reduction in the number of officers in order to reduce expenditures, if, in addition to that mere reduction or retrenchment in expenditures, there is legislation accompanying that reduction which is not necessary for its operation, and which changes existing law without being necessary as part of the general scheme, that is not in order and the Holman rule does not make it in order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, in direct reply to the point now raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON], supported by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM], a mere reading of the gist of the ruling just cited by him precludes any application of that precedent to the matter now before the committee. It was there held that any legislation "not essential" for the carrying out of the reduction contemplated, as a part of the general scheme of reduction, was legislation not within the limits of the Holman rule. The proviso could very well set forth any standard by which these men might be eliminated. To repeat the phrase so often used by the distinguished parliamentarian, Mr. Mann, it could have laid down the rule that no salary shall hereafter be paid to any officer having red hair. Conceding that under existing law there is machinery for weeding out class B officers, that does not prevent another standard and procedure to carry out the purposes of this provision being contained in the proviso. In order to carry out the reduction contemplated in the bill now before us a board is created, and it is an integral part of the general scheme of reduction. The method of selection of those to be retired is a part of the provision retiring the officers. It therefore comes squarely within the Holman rule.

May I recall to the Chair that I raised the very point of order that the gentleman from New York is now raising when we had under consideration the independent offices appropriation bill. An amendment was offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] to transfer the activities of the Farm Board to the Department of Agriculture. He there provided for the transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture of all of the duties now imposed by law on the Farm Board. I raised that very point of order, that it was new legislation and it was not necessary to the amendment curtailing the number of salaried officials or to the purpose of the amendment then before the committee. The Chair overruled my point of order and held it was an integral part of the amendment, and held the amendment in order.

Now, as to the point of order suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] that it is not apparent there would be any saving through the proposed amendment to existing law. I will say that a knowledge of parliamentary law is hardly necessary to decide that point. It is a matter of simple mathematics. A reduction of 2,000 officers is not only provided in the total number, but it is provided that after September 30, 1932, a certain number of each grade shall constitute the maximum officers in that grade, thereby giving the Chair absolute information as to the number of officers in each grade that will be reduced. The bill provides that the officers eliminated shall go on retired pay at 75 per cent of the active pay; and that in and of itself shows a saving of 25 per cent.

If the amendment provided for the retirement of these officers and did not limit the number, then, of course, the Chair would be in the dark as to whether new officers were to be appointed in their places; but the amendment does two things: It fixes the maximum number and it disposes of the number of officers, so that there can be no doubt that there is retrenchment within the meaning of the Holman rule. The provisos in the bill are clearly a saving by the reduction of salaried officers, clearly meeting all the requirements of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LANHAM). The Chair is ready to rule.

The gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] makes the point of order against that part of this paragraph, beginning on page 10, at line 19, and concluding on page 12, in line 20, that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The precedent cited by the gentleman from California would seem to the Chair hardly applicable in view of the fact that it had reference solely to a limitation and not to legislation.

The question of whether or not legislation is in order on an appropriation bill has long had bestowed upon it the broadening effect of the Holman rule, a rule which is familiar to all of the membership of this House. This rule provides that on appropriation bills legislation is in order if it has certain well-defined tendencies. For instance, there is this provision—

> Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

Of course, no contention is made that this part of this paragraph is not germane. In the light of existing law, it is clearly a reduction in the number of officers, and therefore in the amounts of money that will be expended by the Federal Government, and on its face does show retrenchment in governmental expenditure.

It has been argued that that part of the paragraph is not in order which sets up an agency and prescribes the method by which the retrenchment shall be effected.

It seems to the Chair that the provision for the establishment of such an agency is but a declaration of the policy that shall be pursued in effecting the retrenchment, and that it is purely ancillary to the general purpose of this paragraph, and should be taken as an incidental matter in connection with the general and main object of the provisions against which the point of order is directed.

One part of this paragraph, which at first gave the Chair most concern, has not been alluded to in the discussion of the point of order.

In a decision made by former Speaker Longworth when he was serving as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House before his election as Speaker, almost this identical question arose with reference to a proposed reduction of the number of officers, and consequently a corresponding reduction in the amounts of Federal expenditures. This precedent was cited by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CANNON, in his remarks, and may be found in Cannon's Precedents, section 8579. In so far as legislation is concerned, with reference to the limitation of the number of officers, clearly, under the Holman rule and under this decision of former Speaker Longworth, such legislation is permitted on an appropriation bill, and under the Holman rule is rather encouraged.

The point of order of the gentleman from California raises the question of whether or not the fact that the stipulation of the date of September 30, 1932, when the provision would become effective, carries the operation of this legislation beyond the period of the fiscal year for which this particular appropriation bill is designed, and would make it such legislation on an appropriation bill as would be permitted under the Holman rule.

In the Holman rule itself no distinction is made between permanent and temporary legislation, because all legislation, unless by its terms temporary, is necessarily permanent until modified or repealed by subsequent legislation; and in looking for a precedent upon which to base a rational conclusion concerning that portion of this paragraph which stipulates that this reduction shall become effective after September 30, 1932, and thereafter be permanent law the Chair has found an illuminating precedent in the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page 3224 (Cannon's Precedents, sec. 8575), when Mr. Saunders, of Virginia, was acting as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. This decision by Chairman Saunders has been cited as authority during this session of Congress by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in the consideration of the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bills.

In this ruling, which was on March 8, 1918, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was under consideration, and the Clerk read this paragraph:

> The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to discontinue the offices of the Assistant Treasurers at Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, New Orleans—

And so forth, relating to the abolishment of certain offices; and in the construction of that paragraph Mr. Saunders, of Virginia, said, with reference to the point of order made against it:

> The application of the Holman rule is a matter that has been the subject of many rulings, but it seems to the Chair that the case under consideration, while not entirely novel, presents a somewhat unusual aspect of this rule. In connection with the Holman rule it may be said in a preliminary way that the authorities are agreed that the rule is a wholesome one and therefore proper to be liberally construed. Hence if the question presented is difficult of decision under that rule, the Chair, in case of doubt, should resolve that doubt in favor of an interpretation which will submit the paragraph or amendment under consideration to the judgment of the House, which will thereby be put in a position to pass upon the merits of the substantial questions in issue.
> A former Speaker of this body announced the canon of construction for the Holman rule as follows:
> "The purpose of the rule is most beneficial and proper, and it should have a liberal construction in the interest of retrenchment."
> To the same substantial effect Mr. Chairman CRISP:
> "The Holman rule is intended to have a beneficial effect upon the Treasury of the United States. If the Chair is in doubt whether an amendment is in order, this doubt should be resolved against the point of order, for by so doing the Chair works no hardship upon anyone, but submits to the committee itself the privilege of passing upon the amendment. If the committee favor it, then a majority can adopt it. If a majority is opposed to it, then that majority can reject it."

During the present session of Congress, in the consideration of the Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill, previously alluded to, the question also arose on a paragraph of the bill with reference to the abolishment of certain offices in the Bureau of Customs, and this decision made by Chairman Saunders, of Virginia, was cited, and that provision abolishing the offices was held in order on the Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill.

Now, in the light of these decisions, it seems to the Chair that the reduction in the number of officers is no more permanent legislation than that providing for the abolishment of offices. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I have a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not pass upon amendments until they are reported. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment by Mr. BARBOUR:
> Page 10, line 15, after the colon, strike out the remainder of the paragraph down to and including the word "pay," in line 21, page 12.

On page 8, line 19, strike out "$27,209,927" and insert $21,833,427."

Page 8, line 23, strike out "$8,356,200" and insert "$8,545,011."

Page 9, line 4, strike out "$12,914,948" and insert "$9,447,323."

Page 10, line 1, strike out "$132,457,790" and insert "$136,242,204."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my amendment be read for information. When we come to voting on the amendments, my amendment would be voted on first.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina will be reported for the information of the committee.

There was no objection and the Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McSWAIN to H. R. 11897: Beginning on line 11, page 11, strike out all that part beginning with the word "convene" after the word "shall" and ending with the word "shortage" on line 17, page 12, and insert the following in lieu thereof: "first select the general officers to be removed from the active list of the Army, and from the general officers remaining on the active list the President shall convene a board of five general officers, who shall select the officers to be removed from the active list in consequence hereof, and the action of such selection board as to the officers to be removed from the active list shall be final: Provided further, That any officer may be retired upon his own application if same be filed prior to September 1, 1932: Provided further, That the selection by the board aforesaid of the officers to be removed from the active list shall be made solely on the basis of comparative ability, efficiency, and physical fitness, as disclosed by all now-existing efficiency reports and other pertinent official War Department records, and that no removals hereunder shall be made of officers permanently commissioned in the Air Corps or the Judge Advocate General's Department, and that any person who, by any means whatsoever, shall attempt to influence or interfere with the action of said selection board in its work of reduction with respect to the retirement of any officer of the Army, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, at the discretion of the court."

The CHAIRMAN. By agreement in the House the debate upon this paragraph is limited to 2 hours and 30 minutes, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] and one-half by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR].

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered is the amendment that will restore the 2,000 commissioned officers which the bill cuts out from the officer personnel. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, let me say in the very beginning that despite the fact that I have had a number of years of service, that I have worn the uniform of my country as a Regular Army officer, as a reserve officer, and as a National Guard officer, I have never found it necessary at any time or at any place to apologize to anybody for having worn that uniform. I tried to wear it honorably, and I shall not apologize in this House to a professional and fanatical pacifist who calls himself a statesman because of the service that I rendered to my country. [Applause.] Furthermore, I was not a general in the Army of the United States. I was a captain of Infantry. I left my home and my family not because I was drafted and had to go but because I wanted to go. I had passed the age of 32 years and I did not have to register. I volunteered my service. I went to the first officers' training camp. A week before I went to that training camp I never thought that I would have any service in the Army. It never occurred to me that I would be a soldier, but 30 days after war was declared by my country I volunteered, went to the first officers' training camp, came out a captain of Infantry, and served all during the war as a captain of Infantry. [Applause.] While I was doing that I spent 14 months in Europe, having left three little children, the oldest of whom was 5 years of age and the youngest less than 8 months old. I ask the gentleman from Texas what he was doing when I was in France?

Mr. BLANTON. I was doing what the gentleman is doing now, trying to serve my country here, and in doing so I was under specific orders from President Wilson, my Commander in Chief, which I will insert at the end of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Furthermore, I have never yet had to come here and defend my right to sit among my colleagues in this House in a seat to which I was elected by my people.

I did not ask the privilege of the floor for the sole purpose of replying to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], but I have said this much in view of the unkind things that he saw fit to say of me.

With reference to the hearings that he has had before the Committee on Military Affairs on House Resolution 355, he has had the indulgence and the consideration of the committee. I think he has had not less than six hearings, and I did object in the last hearing we had, because we have gone there not less than six times and taken up practically the whole day and the time of 21 Members of Congress in considering the resolution which he has introduced, and we have not yet considered a single, solitary feature of that bill that amounts to anything.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the unanimous-consent agreement had before we went into the committee, we provided for three hours of debate upon this matter, debate to be confined to the bill. When I was trying to tell what happened before the Committee on Military Affairs the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER] prevented me from doing so on points of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. The point of order is that he is not discussing the bill and not keeping within the rule. If he will permit me to answer him as to what occurred in the committee, I have no objection, but I don't want him to go into it when he would not let me go into it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BROWNING). The point of order is well taken in so far as the gentleman is not discussing the bill is concerned. The gentleman is entitled to proceed in order and discuss the paragraph or any amendment thereto.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I have a telegram received this morning from a Mississippian. It is from the commanding general of the Thirtieth National Guard Division, composed of troops from Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Among other things this telegram reads as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., May 10, 1932.

HOMER C. PARKER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Guardsmen and reserves who actively operate national defense act need the training given them by trained Regular officers to give them that chance for preservation of life and limb in a national emergency that adequate training absolutely guarantees. Furthermore, such careful training under Regular officers potentially decreases the number of homes throughout the country that will be thrown into bereavement and mourning as a direct result of elimination of trained officers required to supervise and assist in operating national defense act. The division stands solidly behind the unselfish pronouncements of those experienced veterans, the honorable Secretary of War and the scholarly Chief of Staff who are begging for protection and preservation of lives of citizens that adequate training personnel provides.

As a native-born Mississippian, I am proud of Mississippi's conspicious part in the World War. Pershing's chief of operations, Gen. Fox Conner, and his senior aide, Colonel Quackamyer, were Mississippians; three division commanders were Mississippians; one of the first field officers killed in action, and one of the first enlisted men decorated for bravery were Mississippians. Mississippians served in action under the present Chief of Staff and in other divisions. They shed their blood on practically every battlefield in France. They know the great value of training and skilled leadership. I state unhesitatingly, by the firm conviction, that Mississippi supports the national defense act. I speak authoritatively, not only as a registered voter but as the grandson of a former chief justice and as the son of a mother who has been accorded the honor of fostering the first State-supported college for women in the whole United States. Their potraits are in the Mississippi hall of fame. If I have misquoted the sentiment of the great Thirtieth Division, the adjutants general of the States to which it is allocated will take issue with me. Furthermore, if I have misquoted the veterans and citizens of Mississippi regarding their attitude toward adequate defense measures created in part on advice and wise counsel of fellow Mississippians, I shall expect the disapproval of the press of the State and I invite such condemnation as her Representatives in Congress may see fit to express. Jefferson Davis, Stephen D. Lee Walthall, George Barksdale, and others, of course, knew nothing of mechanization, nor were they skilled in the use of pick and shovel, but they applied the knowledge tactically in trench building to save the lives of their Mississippians and to spare bereavement to the homes they represented. The unselfish spirit of service demonstrated by Lee, Jackson, Grant, Sherman, and others still pervades those who are actively operating the national defense act and that spirit should not be crushed.

EPHRAIM G. PEYTON,
Commanding Thirtieth Division; a Mississippian.

Mr. Chairman, much has been said of the relationship of Army officers and enlisted men with respect to their numerical strength. The most casual study of the present system of our national defense and employment of the officer personnel of the Regular Army will convince even the most skeptical that a proper number of regular officers bears, and can bear, no direct relation to the number of enlisted men of the Regular Army. While it is true that in a division there is a well-established relationship between the number of officers and the number of enlisted men, that relationship can not be applied to our peace-time establishment. Is our Regular Army merely a small body entirely separate and distinct from the other elements making up our defensive system? No. It merely constitutes the framework upon which the whole is hung. Regular Army officers are called upon to perform all manner of duties besides the command of troops of the Regular Army. There is the administration of the supply system for food, clothing, arms, and ammunition; the planning for war-time procurement; sanitation and hospitalization systems; the planning for mobilization; research into means and methods of modern warfare; the instruction and administration of the National Guard, the Organized Reserves, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the citizens' military training camps; the conduct of the service schools, including the Military Academy, the various branch schools, the Command and General Staff School, and the Army War College. The necessity for these schools was firmly established during the World War, and their necessity continues as a means of keeping the officer personnel abreast of the advances in means and methods of warfare. Besides these duties, many officers are employed in various civil activities, assigned to the War Department by law.

On mere numbers alone the officers of the Regular Army exercise supervision over the training, administration, and supply of the following:

Enlisted men, Regular Army	118,750
Philippine Scouts	6,500
National Guard	187,000
Organized Reserves	108,000
Reserve Officers' Training Corps	127,000
Citizens' military training camps	37,500
Total	584,750

This figure, compared to the 12,037 average of Regular Army officers last year, gives a relationship of 48.5 trainees per officer.

A table appended shows clearly the employment of the officers of the Regular Army and the fallacy of attempting to apply a percentage to the relationship between officers and men.

A second table shows the effect upon the civilian components of the proposed reduction of Regular Army officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks to include the balance of this telegram.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, notwithstanding the fact that the gentleman objected to my extending my remarks—I never object to any Member extending his own remarks.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. I, for one, shall permit the gentleman to extend his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Under my leave to extend, I insert the following to show that I was under the orders of my Commander in Chief:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 22, 1917.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: If I can be used at the front, I stand ready to serve my country. When the question was before the House, I voted to increase the maximum age limit to 45, so that I would be included. I likewise voted to subject Members of Congress to the selective draft, in order that I would not be excluded. I am willing to waive my age and position.

My father enlisted as a Confederate soldier at the age of 16. My great-grandfather, William Walker, of Cumberland County, Va., had the privilege of fighting for his country in the Revolution. My mother's uncle, James Monroe Hill, was a veteran of San Jacinto. My oldest son is not 17, but will be ready to respond when the call of his country makes it necessary.

I stand ready to obey your orders should my services be needed and you should see fit to call on me.

With much respect, I remain, very sincerely yours,
THOMAS L. BLANTON.

I received the following reply:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 23, 1917.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: Your letter of May 22 does you great honor. I do not wonder that you feel as you do, and yet I want very earnestly to remind you that we are now engaged not merely in creating an army but also in mobilizing a nation to perform all its functions at the highest pitch of efficiency. Surely in such circumstances it is just as much a man's duty to stay at a post such as you have been assigned to by your constituents as it is for a man to volunteer for an army. I take that view of it with the greatest confidence.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I am reminded of the very sad experience which we had when the Economy Committee presented its bill for the consideration of this committee. In that bill we proposed a saving of practically $260,000,000. By reason of the influence of various groups and individuals interested against the various provisions of that bill—and they were all controversial—it went out of this House with a bare saving of $32,000,000. I am fearful, because of that experience, as to what may happen to this measure.

I wish now, at the outset of this discussion, to call the attention of the committee to the fact that if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California is adopted, it will add to this appropriation $4,000,000. On the other hand, if it is not adopted, it will result in a saving for this next fiscal year of $4,000,000, and for each year thereafter $20,000,000. [Applause.]

The President of the United States has been quoted time and time again with reference to whether he was or was not in favor of certain provisions of our economy bill, and he has likewise been quoted with reference to this bill. For the purpose of ascertaining his position I called on the President this morning, and he authorized me to say to this committee that he expected and hoped and desired that this bill, when it leaves this House, will carry the reduction of $24,000,000 that is proposed by the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. BARBOUR. I would say to the gentleman that we can restore these military activities to the bill, and save more money, if the gentleman will go along on some other amendments which will be offered later.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Here is the best place in the world to commence, for right here is where we can save $4,000,000 and not reduce the efficiency of the Army one iota.

True to form, the Army, the greatest lobbying group in all the United States, is trying to hold on to all it has. There has never been a time since the war but what they have been before this body in every session, resisting every attempt to take away from them something, no matter whether it was good or bad.

You gentlemen who were here directly after the war, when we were trying to get some of the automobiles away from them to distribute around among the various departments where automobiles were needed, will remember that we could not get them to give up a single machine, and they were standing around by the thousands at Perryville, Holabird, and other places, going to wrack and ruin, and Congress had to pass a bill to force them to give them up.

Another illustration: Some time ago, by reason of the increased crime in this country and increased demand for penitentiaries and prison camps, the Committee on Appropriations asked the War Department to give up Camp Eustis for a prison camp. General Summerall, then Chief of Staff, absolutely refused to consider it, notwithstanding the fact it was of no use whatever at that time for the Army. Why did they not do it? Because, he said, "We will need it in case of another war."

One of the greatest mistakes we made was in spending millions that were spent in buying great tracts of land for fortification purposes during that war. We should have commandeered them for the period of the war, paid what it was worth, and then turned them back to the owners thereafter. Happily, by reason of the action of the President, an order was issued by him to the War Department to turn over Camp Eustis to the Department of Justice in order to save millions of dollars to the Government of the United States for prison purposes, and it was done.

These are but few of the illustrations that I might give, and you can not tell me that 5,000 American officers are not as good as 5,000 English officers; yet, while 5,000 English officers are officering the army of England, here we have 12,000 for the same purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], has been harping on the fact—where he got his information is a mystery to me—that the British officered their army with 5,000 officers. The correct figures are that in the Royal British Army, under the Crown, there are, exclusive of air officers, 12,120. In the Royal Air Service there are 3,353, of which 2,000 are assigned to the army. That is the portion of the British Army which is under the Crown. In the Dominion Army in Canada there are 581 officers.

In India there are 5,109. In Australia there are 431. In New Zealand there are 110. In South Africa there are 298. In the Irish Free State there are 500. Those are the regular officers. In addition to that, corresponding to our National Guard, they have their territorial troops. In view of that it is hard for me to understand why this misrepresentation should continue on the floor. But it is not confined to that. You have been led to believe the misstatements made that the 12,000 Regular Army officers we have are for 118,000 enlisted men. That is far from the truth. Any well-informed Member of this House should know better than that.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it not a fact that the Army of France, a country which is too poor to pay even interest on the principal of a greatly shaved war debt, has over 32,317 officers in its regular army?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. That is true. We maintain this Army of ours to fight. The general officers of our Army are highly educated. Behind our first line of defense, which is our Regular Army and our National Guard, is the National Army, our great citizen army that will be mobilized in case of war. To provide the officers which are so essential to an army it is necessary that we have the extra activities of the Organized Reserves training in our schools, citizens' military training camps, and various similar activities.

I am not going to go into all that detail, but I ask unanimous consent to put it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I thank the gentleman.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. My friend here makes it appear that if you vote to reduce these 12,000 officers, it will cause the promotion of juniors, if you cut off these 2,000 officers. As a matter of fact, it will mean stagnation in the Army, because by cutting off these 2,000 men you rob the juniors of 2,000 opportunities for promotion. It will not mean promotion for the junior officers. It will deaden promotion in the Army.

If you cut off those 2,000 officers, you will withdraw 150 officers from the National Guard, 153 officers from the Organized Reserves, 172 officers on duty with Reserve Officers' Training Corps, 257 officers from special service schools, where they get special training, 110 officers who are students at general service schools, 107 instructors at service schools, 21 instructors at the United States Military Academy, and 42 from the recruiting service, or it will be necessary to withdraw 1,000 officers that are now on duty with the civilian components. We hear very much about General Staff officers in Washington holding the equivalent of $1,800 jobs. The most essential thing to a modern army is a highly educated, technical general staff, and we have 100 highly trained officers here in Washington, aside from those at the War College, doing general staff work.

It must be emphasized and reiterated that the function of the commissioned personnel of the Regular Army is much more comprehensive than the command of the enlisted organizations of the Regular Army, important as is this function. The national defense act of 1920 definitely adopted one of the two alternatives requisite in the solution of the ever-present problem of reasonable provision for national defense. Rather than to require universal military training or a conscripted standing Army, it adopted the clear-cut policy of providing the machinery for the military training of a portion of our citizenry without diverting them from their regular civilian activities; in other words, it vitalized the National Guard, the Officers' Reserve Corps, the enlisted reserve corps, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the system of citizens' military training camps. The Regular Army officers constitute the essential and indispensable nucleus for this training.

The national defense act of 1920 in visualizing the importance of this function provided for approximately 18,000 commissioned officers. This strength has already been reduced by law to a maximum of 12,402, and the limitations of the annual appropriations have reduced the actual average strength to 12,000. The War Department realizes the extreme importance of the duty devolving upon it under the national defense act and is zealously seeking still to discharge all of these functions to an effective degree, notwithstanding the reduced facilities which have been accorded to it. The minimum number of officers requisite for a reasonably satisfactory accomplishment of these functions is slightly over 14,000. Any reduction, whether it be 1,000 or more or less, from the present strength will seriously disrupt the existing organization and further menace our already gravely weakened preparation for national defense. It will necessitate a curtailment of the training activities above referred to, will make it impossible to maintain the small balanced mobile force necessary for emergency, will involve the discontinuance of the active manning of some (possibly all) of our seacoast defenses at vital points, will prevent the maintenance of adequate garrisons overseas, and will impair the adequate training of officers themselves.

EFFECTS OF REDUCING THE AUTHORIZED NUMBER OF ARMY OFFICERS TO 11,000

The present authorized commissioned strength of the Army is 12,402, and its actual strength on March 31, 1932, was 11,975. This number is not sufficient to carry out the purposes of the national defense act. To reduce it to 11,000 would necessarily force a drastic curtailment of many important activities to an extent which would seriously handicap the operation of the present system of national defense. A preliminary survey of the situation indicates that the following reductions in the number of officers now assigned to the duties mentioned below would have to be made:

Activity	Number of active officers to be withdrawn	Per cent of present number
Duty with National Guard	150	35
Duty with Organized Reserves	153	35
Duty with Reserve Officers' Training Corps	[1]172	35
Students at special service schools	257	35
Students at general service schools	110	35
Instructors at service schools	107	25
Instructors at U. S. Military Academy	21	10
Recruiting duty	[2]42	50
Total	1,012

[1] 102 retired officers also withdrawn.
[2] 20 retired officers also withdrawn.

A consideration of the foregoing tabulation shows the following:

NATIONAL GUARD

More than one-third of the Regular Army officers now engaged in assisting in the training of the 12,000 officers and 175,000 enlisted men of the National Guard would be withdrawn.

ORGANIZED RESERVES

The Organized Reserves, containing 103,000 reserve officers, will be the principal reliance for commissioned personnel in the event of a national emergency. More than one-third of the Regular Army officers who are now assigned to the instruction and training of this force would be lost.

RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS

The Reserve Officers' Training Corps, with a strength of 127,000, is the principal source of replacements for the Officers' Reserve Corps. Not only would 172 of the active Regular Army officers who are now on duty with this activity be withdrawn but the services of 102 retired officers would also be lost.

ARMY SCHOOL SYSTEM

Four hundred and seventy-four officers would have to be withdrawn from the Army school system, including the general and special service schools. It is in this school system that regular officers receive that theoretical instruction in modern warfare which is so essential to the maintenance of their efficiency and their ability to perform their rôle in national defense.

UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY

The instructing personnel at the United States Military Academy would be reduced by 21, with a resulting harmful effect upon the efficiency with which that institution can be conducted.

RECRUITING SERVICE

A loss of 42 active and 20 retired officers from the force now engaged in recruiting duty would seriously cripple that activity.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN].

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, if my amendment, which proposes to favor officers on the basis of their relative efficiency rather than the arbitrary standard of age, is agreed to, I will support the bill. [Applause.]

It is manifest that the measure of age is no test as to the efficiency or efficacy of anyone, in the Army or out of it. Army officers are rated in three groups, satisfactory, excellent, and superior. If you take 2,000 officers out by an arbitrary, indiscriminate line the assumption is that you will take out one-third of the 2,000 who are superior, one-third who are excellent, and only one-third who are merely satisfactory, which is the bare passing mark to escape the B Board. It seems to me, then, too obvious for argument that in this particular the amendment ought to be agreed to.

There are two other features in my amendment that I must hurry briefly to call your attention to. First, it excludes from this removal proposition every officer of the Air Corps, irrespective of any discretion in the chief, as is proposed by the bill. The Air Corps is already 393 officers below authorized strength. Anybody who thinks a moment realizes the great importance of that new weapon of war. We must fill that up as soon as possible.

The next suggestion of my amendment is that the officers of the Judge Advocate General's Corps shall also be excluded from the operation of this provision of the bill. The other day when the matter first came up a gentleman sitting right behind me, when attention was called to the fact that the bill that is pending would take out 50 of the 84 officers in the corps of the Judge Advocate General, made a derisive remark to this effect: "Do these lawyers fight?"

No; they did not fight, but let me tell you, Members of Congress, that they are a very important factor of this department of the Government. Of the 84 in that department, all but 5 had civilian practice before they were commissioned in the Army. They were lawyers like you and me. They have most important problems to pass upon. They pass upon all legal questions with reference to insular affairs; all legal questions with reference to the Panama Canal; all contracts for supplies; all purchases of real estate and the sale of real estate; the leasing, by contract, of warehouses and Army bases; and last—and I call your especial attention to this—the review and consideration of the administration of military justice. I submit to you that a lawyer who has practiced law in our civil courts is better prepared to administer military law with civilian justice than a lawyer who has never practiced except in the military courts. If you take these lawyers out, they will be supplanted by officers transferred from the line who have never tried a case in the civil courts, who have been in the Army all their lives, have the militaristic point of view; and they are not able to properly appreciate the point of view that you and I realize is so indispensable in the sane administration of military justice. [Applause.]

These officer lawyers who were lawyers in civil life before entering the Army will and do temper military justice with civilian mercy.

The purpose of my amendment is to meet, as far as possible, the present demands of economy, and ultimately to promote the efficiency of our defense forces. The proposal to reduce the line officers and to make the reduction upon the basis of efficiency and fitness, rather than the arbitrary basis of age, ought to meet the two requirements of economy and efficiency. If conditions are not improved, when we come to consider the appropriation bills next year, we may then find it necessary further to reduce in other items the expenses of the Army. If conditions shall have improved, and we sincerely hope they shall, then we can reasonably expect to increase the strength of the Army, by filling up the Air Corps, and otherwise.

My amendment proposes to exclude the Air Corps from any reduction whatsoever, for the reason that the Air Corps is now 393 officers below its authorized strength, as contemplated by the 5-year program. There may be relatively inefficient officers in the Air Corps, but if there are, they will automatically eliminate themselves. We have now more than 600 graduates of the flying school, all of whom are well trained and qualified pilots, but they can not be commissioned in the Air Corps because all vacancies heretofore existing on the promotion list have been filled by the graduates from the Military Acadamy.

I hope that it will be possible soon to take into the Army enough graduates of the flying school to complete the authorized strength of the Air Corps, and also to commission some enlisted men from the Army, and choice graduates of recognized military schools and highly qualified young men from the National Guard, as contemplated by the national defense act.

The method proposed by the bill of removing the older officers in each of the respective grades is purely arbitrary, and will not permanently relieve the "hump," and will not bring about a gradual and uniform flow of promotion in the Army. There will be a temporary advancement in each of the grades to take the places of the older officers eliminated, but by eliminating these older officers you will remove the very class of officers who would first be retired either for disabilities incident to age or by reaching the age limit. Also, to remove by the arbitrary fact of age will mean that at least two-thirds of those removed are superior and excellent officers. Officers are classified as superior, excellent, and satisfactory, and those classified as unsatisfactory are eliminated by the class B route. It is a fair assumption that of a given 2,000 officers one-third are superior, one-third are excellent, and one-third satisfactory. My proposal to remove by the standard of efficiency and merit, as disclosed by existing War Department records, would preserve to the service all superior officers and all excellent officers and eliminate only those who made the passing grade of satisfactory.

My amendment also proposes to exclude from removal the officers in the Department of the Judge Advocate General. The 84 officers in this department are all former lawyers practicing in civilian life, with the exception of 5 who have been transferred from other branches of the service. These law officers have a very responsible task. Their opinions control the action of the War Department in all insular matters, such as the Philippine Islands, Hawaii, and Porto Rico; in the Panama Canal matters; in all matters relating to the purchase and sale of real estate and the leasing of real estate, including warehouses; and also in reviewing judgments of courts-martial in the administration of military law. I submit that it would be a most serious mistake to deprive the War Department of the services of these seasoned and trained lawyers and to fill up that department with line officers transferred into the Department of the Judge Advocate General without any previous experience or training in civil law. Thus the War Department would be almost at the mercy of skillful and able lawyers representing private interests against the Government.

We Members of Congress who do not understand nor fully sympathize with the militaristic attitude of officers who, while still boys, were taken into the military system would contemplate with indignation and disgust the administration of military justice by officers of this type. The present personnel of the Judge Advocate General's Department, being lawyers with experience in civil life, can and do temper military justice with civilian mercy. These officers do not become inefficient with age. They are not subjected to the rigors of field service; they should be well able to serve the Government until they are 64 years old. I think one of the best lawyers at my home bar is over 70 years of age and still does as much work as he ever did.

My amendment proposes that the President shall select the general officers to be removed. The committee bill contemplates that the general officers shall select which general officers shall be removed. It may well be that some of the general officers on the board convened under the provisions of the committee bill should be removed, but it is not human to expect that they would remove themselves.

The board, under my amendment, is limited absolutely to five of those general officers to remain after the President has selected those to be removed. A board of more than five would be too large for efficient service. Centralize power and localize and individualize responsibility and we will get quicker and better service.

My amendment permits any officer to be retired on his own application prior to September 1, 1932, and I have heard that there are several officers who would gladly avail themselves of this privilege, and probably there are many who would. All these provisions of my amendment contemplate higher efficiency, so that a reduced number of personnel will, on the average, accomplish more work.

Then, finally, my amendment proposes to protect the board of five general officers against interference and undue influence. Some may argue that my proposal to eliminate on the basis of efficiency ratings and physical fitness, as shown by the records in the War Department, may lead to favoritism. The records are now in the War Department and can not be altered. When five general officers gather around a table, with the records in front of them, it is not humanly likely that all five officers will agree at the same time to an unfair and an illegal thing by ignoring the records. But my amendment proposes to erect a criminal barrier against those, whether in the Army or outside, whether in Congress or outside, who shall seek to project any influence whatsoever into the deliberation of that board.

The general officers should understand that this penal proposal is not aimed at them, but is aimed for their protection from annoyance, from irritating interference, and time-taking interviews and correspondence. If I were to be on the general board, I would thank Congress to save me from these annoyances.

If my amendment as to the method of selecting the officers to be removed be agreed to, I will then, in this emergency, vote for the reduction of 2,000 line officers. When economic conditions improve, it will then be our duty, first, to fill up the Air Corps from the choice graduates of the flying school. Next, we should give a real opportunity in fact for able young men to rise from the ranks, and from the National Guard, and to honor graduates from our best military schools and colleges.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the lady from California [Mrs. KAHN]. [Applause.]

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this section in this bill seems to me to be a deliberate attempt to weaken our national defense. The preamble of the Constitution says, among other things, "to insure domestic tranquility and to provide for the common defense, we do ordain and establish this Constitution."

There are some economies which are far more expensive than any extravagances, and any attempt to weaken our national defense is one of these economies.

The military policy of the United States from the beginning of the Revolutionary War down to and including the declaration of war against Germany in 1917 was characterized, first, by the entrance of the United States into the war without an army with which to fight the war; second, the organization and development of the war army during the progress of the war; and third, the breaking up of the war army immediately following the conclusion of the war.

In 1916 the first step was taken to enunciate a comprehensive military policy based purely upon American principles, and only in the national defense act in 1920 do we have for the first time a well-developed and well-planned military policy, which for all time we had hoped would insure domestic tranquillity and provide for the common defense. The act of June 4, 1920, provides the machinery for the national defense. It provides a plan which is adequate, fully comprehensive, and effective. It provides for an army whose character is defined by its three components, a small Regular Army, a National Guard, and an Organized Reserve. In peace times these national defense organizations are highly skeletonized, only the bare framework being in existence, but the plan provided by the act of June 4, 1920, was so perfected that every part of the skeleton fits into its appointed place and can be expanded in the most orderly manner and with comparatively little delay. But how are we living up to the provisions of the national defense act? Congress, given this comprehensive and adequate plan for the national defense of this great country of ours, has not carried out the full provisions of the act, but has pared and scraped, economized, and cut down, and the present Congress threatens to further weaken this arm of our defense beyond repair.

Let us live up to the provisions of the national defense act, for who can tell when the crucial time may come that this deliberate weakening of our whole scheme of defense may spell the difference between victory and defeat? Not only from without but from within should we build up a scheme of defense.

The following letter, which is in this morning's RECORD, was written to Hon. JAMES L. WHITLEY by Gen. Douglas MacArthur, Chief of Staff, in answer to a query of his, and in order to call it again to the attention of the House I am going to read it here:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, D. C., May 9, 1932.

Hon. JAMES L. WHITLEY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. WHITLEY: Replying to your inquiry wherein you ask if any reports have been received at the War Department in reference to communistic meetings in your district, I beg to advise you that the following message has been received in reference to a meeting held Friday evening, May 6, showing that the communists of that section are taking an active part in fighting the pending Army appropriation bill. I give you the message in full, as follows:

"Smith Street communist meeting held Friday evening, May 6, was jubilant at the prospect of probable cut in military budget.

"Miss Gertrude Walsh (Welch) addressed the meeting and urged the sending of more fictitious telegrams signed Jones, Wentworth, Adams, Brown, Douglas, etc., to Members of Congress.

"Communists here are preparing special posters showing red flag of victory to celebrate the destruction of the Army of the United States."

Very sincerely yours,

DOUGLAS MACARTHUR,
General, Chief of Staff.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the gentlewoman from California says that in her judgment this effort to reduce the officer personnel of the Army by some 2,000 is a deliberate blow at the national defense. I very sharply disagree with that opinion, and I believe that if this House will adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN] and reduce the officer personnel by some 2,000 it will take a great step in behalf of the efficiency and the morale of the Army and consummate a wonderful movement toward the improvement of the defense of this country. [Applause.]

There are three things, gentlemen, which make up the morale of the officer and make for the efficiency of your Army. First, promotion; second, pay; and, third, housing. Of these three elements the one which contributes most to the morale is promotion. If you hold out to a man the hope of reward through advanced rank, he is willing to undergo all kinds of privations and all kinds of hardships, but if you close to him the door of advancement, the opportunity for promotion then and there you stifle and kill his morale. The removal of some 2,000 officers from the present officer list of the Army would remove the stagnation which now exists on that list, and would remove the impediments which prevent a normal flow of promotion in the Army.

Some time ago the Secretaries in charge of the different departments of our national defense appointed what is known as the Interdepartmental Pay Board. This board had as its chairman and representative from the Army Brig. Gen. G. S. Simonds, a member of the General Staff.

This board made a thorough and a complete study of the promotion list of the Army and of the opportunities for promotion offered to the individual officer. It made a most illuminating report in which it called attention to the fact that some one-half of the officers now on the promotion list of the Army came into the Army within a period of less than 18 months, and that nearly all of these officers are about the same age. Under normal conditions the admission of this large number of officers should have covered a period of some 15 or 20 years. As a result of all of these officers coming in within so short a period of time, and of all of them being about the same age, this interdepartmental board says that there has come about a disastrous effect upon the morale of the Army and that this condition has a direct influence on the efficiency with which the Regular Army can be expected to fulfill its mission in national defense. The board goes on to say that not only does this condition seriously impair the efficiency of the Army, but that it will entail constantly increasing cost upon the Government and the Treasury. Then it concludes by saying that there must be compulsory removal of a number of officers if we are to have the morale in our Army that we must have to have effective and efficient national defense. [Applause].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Alabama two additional minutes.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will the gentleman yield? I would like to ask the gentleman whether they are promoted by efficiency or by seniority?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. To-day, the officers are promoted by seniority. They go up by seniority and efficiency does not enter into promotion.

The finest statement I have ever heard before your Committee on Military Affairs during my term of some eight years on that committee was a plea by that great soldier and splendid gentleman, General Summerall, for the Congress to do something to relieve the Army of this stagnation in its promotion lists, a plea by General Summerall to you, through your committee, to eliminate if need be these officers and to bring about that normal flow of promotion which we must have if we are to have an efficient army in this country. [Applause.]

For days and for weeks your committee has in the past held hearings on this question and, always, the hearings inevitably led your committee to the conclusion that there was but one thing that could be done and that was to remove some 2,000 officers from the promotion list. [Applause.]

If you, in your personal contacts, will talk to individual officers in the War Department, talk to them in confidence, there is scarcely one of them who will not tell you that the great detriment to the Army to-day is the stagnation in promotion, and that the Army has at least 2,000 officers who ought to go off of the promotion list. [Applause.]

[Here the gravel fell.]

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY].

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I have always been an advocate of adequate national defense and, therefore, I am opposed to cutting off the heads of these 2,000 officers; I am opposed to the very severe slashes in the appropriations for the reserve officers and for the citizens' military training camps and for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

Of course, our primary danger is from the outside, from a foreign enemy that might attack, but I wish to emphasize that we to-day face domestic dangers. In my city, I was caught in a riot of communists and I saw 1 or 2 fellows, unarmed, attack 8 or 10 policemen who had clubs and were armed.

When I have 150,000 men in my city who have been out of work for nearly two years and who have 700,000 women and children dependent upon them who are absolutely desperate, I would not be a bit surprised to see street fighting in my city next winter, unless times improve, on a scale such as you have seen it in some of the Russian cities.

When you train these high-school boys in the citizens' military training camps and when you train your college boys in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps camps, and when you take the men of middle age who are in the Reserve Officers' Corps and give them training and give them lectures in patriotism and fortitude, you are building up a line of defense against forces in this country which are a real menace.

I have attended these camps in Michigan. We have 3,000 reserve officers. We have 1,600 at the citizens' military training camp at Battle Creek, and we have 3,300 applications. These boys and youths can not afford to take this training unless they get some assistance from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLANCY. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Does the gentleman realize that, under this bill, the great cut of 2,000 officers are the fine emergency officers that we had in our training camps at the outbreak of the war, and also the old noncommissioned officers in the Army at that time and have spent their lives in the service?

Mr. CLANCY. That is why I am against that provision.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I have noticed on this floor a tendency to minimize the service of officers. I am afraid some of our Members think only of the enlisted men. Is the gentleman familiar with the losses in battle during the World War?

Mr. CLANCY. No; but I would like to have that list.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I will give it to you. These are the battle losses of the American Expeditionary Forces. This is the list of the killed and those who died of wounds per 1,000 engaged:

Enlisted men, 24.5 per cent; emergency officers, 21.6; regular officers, nongraduates, 25.7; regulars, graduates of the United States Military Academy, 42 per cent.

The heaviest losses of the war in any grade were first lieutenants, graduates of the United States Military Academy, 195.1; captains, graduates of the United States Military Academy, 54 per cent; enlisted men, 24.5.

Mr. CLANCY. The gentleman from Oregon said he had a secret that he was going to give us about the national defense. I wonder if he cares to give it to us now.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. We have a General Staff in the War Department that——

Mr. CLANCY. I emphatically agree with the statement of the gentleman from Oregon, General MARTIN, that one of the serious features of cutting off the heads of these 2,000 Army officers is that it will cripple the reserve forces of the Nation.

These Army officers are assigned to help train the 3,000 reserve officers of Michigan, who have one 14-day period of training each year with pay and who serve 200 hours without pay during a 5-year period. The president of Michigan Reserve Officers' Association is Maj. James E. Murphy, who appeared before the subcommittee of which Mr. COLLINS is the chairman when the appropriations were being considered, and who protested against cuts which would be so heavy that they would destroy the Reserve Officers' Association.

The citizens' military training camps in Michigan are a great success. One camp is at Battle Creek and is known as Camp Custer, the other is Fort Brady at Sault Ste. Marie. The one at Camp Custer provides yearly for 1,600 high-school boys, but through hard work the reserve officers have drummed up 3,300 applications for this camp. Here young men are given not only military training but character training and are taught to be honest, and above all they are inculcated with fortitude and patriotism.

The Reserve Officers' Training Corps for college men is another worthy institution which is a vital factor in our national defense.

Major Murphy has escorted me to the field and quarters of the reserve officers in Wayne County. These officers have obtained 300 acres of land, with a large building and stables thereon, for which there is no Federal appropriation. The reserve officers pay $500 per month out of their own pockets for the maintenance of this training camp.

I emphasize again that the reserve forces of the United States must be maintained not only for national defense against foreign aggressors but as a first line of defense in case there are riots and disorders and attempts to overthrow the Government by mobs in some of our larger cities.

One violent mob, if not quickly controlled, could do enough damage in any large city to offset the entire cost of training these reserves of boys, youths, and men for one year.

The drastic cut of the appropriation of the Officers' Reserve Corps can mean but one thing: It is the end of the corps for the time being.

Reserve officers are required to provide themselves with uniforms and other equipment at considerable expense to themselves. Now they are asked to contribute 14 days of their valuable business time without pay. If such a situation comes to pass it is doubtful if any officer will agree to attend a training camp this year.

It must be remembered that the reserve movement is a voluntary one, and should it be neglected the project will be seriously handicapped. The reserve officers give freely of their time for several months each year attending schools without pay.

This country must have trained officers in time of war. Officers must be trained in time of peace for this duty and can only be so trained by attending schools without pay. They only receive pay now for the 14 days in camp once in every three or four years.

I include as my own remarks a memorandum handed to me by Major Murphy.

ARGUMENTS IN FAVOR OF RETENTION IN BUDGET OF AMOUNT FOR 14-DAY TRAINING PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF ORGANIZED RESERVE

1. This is a national defense item, included in the Budget for the fiscal year 1933, approved by the President. Therefore, attempts to eliminate it can be regarded as nothing but endeavors to hamstring the entire national defense project.

2. The Chief of Staff of the Army, in the hearing before the House Subcommittee on War Department Appropriations, expresses his opinion that the training of reserve officers is absolutely essential. Reductions in the appropriations which would hamper training would be as severe in their effects on the efficiency of our Army as a disastrous military campaign.

3. Elimination of training pay and allowances would deprive the majority of reserve officers of the opportunity to take active-duty training, because their financial condition will not permit them to make the sacrifice. This will be readily recognized by a consideration of the following factors:

(a) The average tour of active duty for the Organized Reserves is but once in three years for each reserve officer.

(b) Ninety per cent of the reserve officers receiving active duty with pay and allowances are below field grade (under the grade of major).

(c) The great majority of them are in moderate circumstances. They comprise, in the main, the following classes:

(1) Younger professional men who have not yet reached the peak of their earning capacity;

(2) Small tradesmen, merchants, and business men who are not yet solidly established; and

(3) Employees working on a salary basis.

(d) These men do not, as a rule, receive any compensation from their usual sources of income during the time they are at camp. If they are professional men, they must arrange to turn over the affairs of their clients or patients to colleagues while they are away. If they are small tradesmen, merchants, or business men, they must pay some one to operate their business or look after their affairs while they are away, or close up shop and suffer the consequent loss of business and good will. If employed on a salary basis, they must sacrifice either two weeks' pay or their regular vacation period.

4. The amount of money drawn by the average reserve officer as active-duty pay every three years does not come to more than $126 for each 14-day period of active duty. This amount does not cover the expense to which each reserve officer is put in procuring and maintaining his military equipment.

5. The Navy supply bill, recently passed, did not deprive Naval Reserve officers of their pay and allowances while on active duty. It would be neither sensible nor just, therefore, to discriminate against reserve officers of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I would much prefer to hear arguments against the present bill based on the merit and the one purpose of a United States Army, viz, national defense. This is no time and not the place to create fear and class hatred.

I do not believe that the opponents of the bill are strengthening their case in their constant repetition that the Army is needed to solve the unemployment situation. I do not believe that the constant warning of domestic unrest has any bearing on the question before us. My God, I want to get work and bread for the American workman and not bayonets and bullets. [Applause.]

Another argument that is constantly made is that the retirement of 2,000 officers will impair the national defense. I do not believe there is a man in this House that believes any such statement. Talk to any Army officer privately and confidentially and he will tell you of the various humps in various grades which are retarding promotion by superannuated officers who should be retired.

The elimination of 2,000 officers will in no way weaken the national defense, and all this talk about this Government neglecting the national defense I do not believe can be borne out by the figures.

We had during the last fiscal year in the Regular Army—and if I am wrong I want some one to correct me—we had in the Regular Army 118,750 men and 11,822 officers. We had in the National Guard 12,943 officers and 202 noncommissioned officers and 171,226 enlisted men. There were 117,423 students receiving regular military training in the various educational institutions of the country. These students are armed, uniformed, and trained by the United States Army.

We had in the citizens' military training camps 37,500 and in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps we have 110,000 trained officers, excluding the National Guard officers. Therefore we have now in active military service subject to call 579,866 men and officers.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. It may not be important, but the gentleman has overlooked the fact that we have also 6,500 Philippine Scouts—not a large number, but for the sake of accuracy I think they should be considered.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I thank the gentleman. It has been suggested, however, that in our economy plan they will be eliminated. The total appropriation in this bill for military activities, excluding the Panama Canal and nonmilitary activities, amounts to something over $281,000,000. I submit it is hardly fair to suggest even that Congress is in any way neglecting the national defense, with an enormous budget of over $281,000,000. In amount I think that is more than the military budget of any other country.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In a moment. The gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] a few moments ago made the point of order on the bill, based on the fact that the provisos did not show retrenchment. As soon as that was disposed of, the gentleman from California offered an amendment striking out the provisos which would eliminate 2,000 officers, but increases the appropriations over $4,000,000. If there has been any doubt that the bill does not in and of itself bring about economies, and therefore is a retrenchment within the meaning of the Holman rule, I think that action on the part of the gentleman from California disposes of the doubt. Further, I do not think it fair when a Member happens to go along with the committee in these times of economic stress and votes with it for the sake of economy, that he should immediately be branded a radical and grouped as being against adequate defense. I do not believe that is conducive to good, sound legislation. I submit that if any Member of this House could talk confidentially with any of the experienced officers or any of the line officers of the senior grade, without exception he would be told that the elimination and retirement of these 2,000 officers will not in any way disturb the efficiency of the Army.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I have discussed that very matter with a great many of the most efficient staff officers of the Army within the last week, and they are unanimous that this will absolutely impair the efficiency of the Army.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And all that we have been hearing for the last four years is to get rid of the hump.

Mr. BACON. This will not get rid of the hump. It will make it worse.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, no; the gentleman is in error there.

Mr. BACON. That is the opinion of the staff of the Army.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The General Staff itself offered a promotion bill that would promote groups regardless of any military demand or necessity.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, yes; they wanted to bring everybody up. Promotion rather than efficiency seems to be the order of the day.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no; it was entirely different.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I know the gentleman is perfectly fair, and therefore I would not want him to create a wrong impression. I disagree with the gentleman absolutely, and I know the conditions do not exist that the gentleman reports.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. On that we disagree. Another thing I want to point out is the fact that the committee says these men are dropped. No such thing. You gentlemen know that when they are on the retired list they are subject to call at any time in an emergency and also that they are subject to call for various duties with their consent. More than that, they are not dropped at all. Certainly, they are not dropped in the cruel, ruthless way that Congress dropped 700 employees in the Department of the Interior, throwing them out on the streets on July 1. These men go on the retired list for 75 per cent of their active pay, which means 75 per cent pay and fogies.

Mr. KVALE. When the gentleman speaks of these men being dropped, does the gentleman have in mind the proposal embodied in the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN]?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. That is based on efficiency. I am sure the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] has confidence in the staff officers to whom he has just referred, who are going to make the selections. I want to point out, without criticism, that the plucking of these officers is to be made upon the ground of military efficiency, and there is no disgrace about being placed on the retired list under those circumstances.

Mr. BACON. Is the gentleman talking about the bill as it is at present, or as it would be with the McSwain amendment added?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I am talking about it with the McSwain amendment which we are going to adopt in a few minutes. That being so, how can there be any justification for opposition to the bill, when we establish that these 2,000 men to be put upon the retired list with 75 per cent of their active pay, which means pay and longevity, subject to be called in an emergency, shall be selected on an efficiency basis? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I think it is always unfortunate to attempt to quote the President of the United States in this Chamber from memory of a conversation. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] has had vastly wider experience in this Chamber than I, but I must say that his attempt to repeat something that he alleged the President said came as a distinct shock to me. I immediately checked up on the facts, because I think this House ought to have them. The facts are as follows: The Secretary of War, Mr. Hurley, came before this Subcommittee on Appropriations and stated unequivocally that he could save not $24,000,000 but $34,000,000.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. BEEDY. No. Let me state these facts, and if I am wrong I will yield to the gentleman.

The position of the President is that $25,000,000 must be saved and ought to be saved, but that the War Department ought to have the right to say where that cut should come; that it should be made in such manner as not to cut into the very heart of the national-defense program. There the President stands. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman is still mistaken.

Mr. BEEDY. Well, I am not mistaken, if the gentleman will pardon me. That is what the Secretary of War said before the gentleman's committee. Furthermore, I am not mistaken as to the stand of the President.

Now, the War Department does not sanction this cut of 2,000 officers. I confess that I know all too little about the details of Army tactics and the science of Army maneuvers. I regret I have been unable to give, in service along those lines, but there is no one here more earnest to do the safe and right thing at this time than I am. I can not bring myself to see that it is in the interest of economy in the slightest degree to cut the vitals out of this system of our defense. That is just what will result if you scale down the number of officers, cut out the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and the citizens' military training camps.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], for whom I have as high a degree of respect as for any man in this House, asked me the other day if I could not give the House some information as to the proportion of officers to men in our Army as compared with other armies. I now have them. I will give them to the committee, and these figures I am about to quote are taken from the armament yearbook of the League of Nations.

Let us take first the army of Great Britain. She has a force of 363,591 regular enlisted men. She has a total of 20,166 regular officers, or 1 officer to every 18 men.

France has a total of 422,465 regular enlisted men and 30,270 regular officers; 1 officer to 14 men.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Are these figures for the regular army?

Mr. BEEDY. These are the regular officers and the regular enlisted men.

Italy, regular enlisted men, 491,398; regular officers, 22,137; almost twice as many officers as this great country of ours has. One officer to every 22 men.

Japan, 266,248 regular enlisted men, 17,343 regular officers; 1 officer to 15 men.

Poland, 265,980 regular enlisted men; 17,090 regular officers; 1 officer to 15 men.

Germany, stripped of her defense under the treaty, has 194,900 regular enlisted men—a great deal more than we have—and 4,291 regular officers; 1 officer to every 22 men.

Now, it seems to me the House misses the entire point of our plan for national defense. We had two choices when we passed this law in 1920. We could have adopted a policy of conscription and kept a regular army up to war strength. In such case the ratio of officers to men melts proportionately. We might also have set up a trained army of professional soldiers and maintained it up to war strength. In such case the officer proportion fades away proportionately. However, we would have none of those systems.

We decided to set up the mere skeleton of a standing army, and set up a reserve army. Because we have this great reserve army, and only a small standing Army, we necessarily have a higher proportion of officers to actual enlisted men in time of peace. We have 1 officer to 10 men.

But what are the plans in the War Department? In times of national emergency we plan to put 6 field armies, or 4,000,000 men into action. Who will lead those men? We have our 12,000 regular officers, unless you cut them down to 10,000. We have 13,000 regular officers in the guard. We have 80,000 available officers in the reserves, and then altogether we have only 105,000. The Army experts tell us we need 250,000 officers to lead 4,000,000 men in the field. Then we must get 145,000 more officers from somewhere.

Now, you need not accept my judgment. Let us listen to men who know what they are talking about—General Summerall, than whom no finer officer was ever in our Army, and he comes from that great section of our country which we call the South. He said that in peace times we can not carry out the purpose of this defense act with less than 14,000 officers.

What did Napoleon say? Napoleon said, "There is no such thing as a bad army; only bad officers."

What did General MacArthur say before your committee as to the necessity of this officered strength? He said, "The Army can live on short rations, it can be insufficiently clothed and housed, it can even be poorly armed and equipped, but it is doomed to destruction without the trained and adequate leadership of its officers."

Now, those are the facts which this House faces, and this House can do with this Army appropriation bill what it will. I do not believe the fate of the Nation hangs on whether we have 10,000 or 12,000 officers in peace times, but I do think that in the end it will prove a very costly experiment if we vote this cut in our officer force.

I feel very deeply about this thing. I face opposition in the coming elections the same as other Members, and I lay myself open to criticism, misunderstanding criticism, of people who will not take the facts first and then pass judgment later. I am anxious for economy, wise and prudent management, but I beg of this House not to slash this appropriation bill and cut 2,000 men from our peace-time officer quota.

I regret that my friend, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], is not present. He said last Tuesday that the cost of maintaining our Army had increased three times since 1915. That is not the fact.

The average cost of supporting the other departments of the Government since 1915 has increased 413 per cent, but the cost of supporting our Army since 1915 has increased only 152 per cent. Assuming that it had increased 300 per cent, let my friend the gentleman from Indiana go back to the veterans in Indiana who fought this last war and ask them if in 1918 they had only one-third of the officers necessary to lead them under German fire. Oh, they had barely a tenth of the needed trained officer leaders, and they paid for such lack of leadership in unnecessary and regrettable loss of life. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WRIGHT].

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to preface the few remarks I shall make with some words of explanation. To begin with, I am not now, never have been, and never expect to be a pacifist as that word is construed throughout our country to-day. In the next place, I have always maintained that we should have adequate and reasonable defense for this country and have always supported appropriations for this purpose. I am proud of our American Army. I have high admiration and high respect not only for the Regular Army and its officials but for the civilian components of our Army. With this preface, I would like to talk a little about some of the features of this bill on which the heaviest attacks are made.

It is a little amusing to me to see how excited my friend the gentleman from Oregon, General MARTIN, gets about this matter, and General CHIPERFIELD, General Goss, and the others. I can not name them all, but those are the ones who have been loudest, I believe, in their protests against some provisions the committee has seen fit to insert in the bill. Gentlemen, that is all easily explainable to me. They are excellent gentlemen; they are splendid Representatives; they are patriotic citizens. My mother told me when I was a little boy the way things looked depended upon the kind of glass through which one looked. In other words, if you looked through a green glass, everything looked green; if you looked through a blue glass, everything looked blue. The life work of my good friend here, the gentleman from Oregon, has been that of a professional military man, which is not to his discredit. He is to be commended for it. However, when one spends a lifetime in the military profession, one does not see except through a military glass. My friend can not appreciate the position of the civilians in the United States and the fact that hunger and want are stalking over this great country of ours. [Applause.] He is looking only at the military aspects of the problem.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I was enough of a civilian to carry a good strong Republican district as a Democrat. I have not spent all my life in the military service; I have seen a little bit of politics.

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman has just lately entered this game, and has not learned much about it yet, but I think the gentleman will. [Applause.]

This appropriation bill was drawn by a subcommittee of five Members, composed of gentlemen from California, Minnesota, Mississippi, Arkansas, and the humble Member from Georgia who now has the floor. We had no fights in that committee about the drafting of this bill. Everything was harmonious, even though the members of the committee perhaps did not see all things alike. True, when we inserted some of these provisions my good friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] said he was not in accord with them. He had a right not to be. When the subcommittee reported this bill to the full committee we had no difficulty in particular—had no friction—and I want to say that I believe my friend BARBOUR was the only Member who really made a reservation, as we call it, to this bill when it was before the full committee.

Now, what are we doing by the terms of this bill?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman from Georgia take the same position the chairman of the committee took, that it was not necessary to call the Chief of Staff or get any information from him, that the committee knew more about it than he did?

Mr. WRIGHT. The Chief of Staff was before the committee and testified to his heart's content. [Applause.] The Chief of Staff was placed on notice that there was a movement to cut the officer personnel by 2,000 men.

Mr. SNELL. That is not an answer to my question. Was the Chief of Staff questioned about this proposition?

Mr. WRIGHT. If the gentleman will look at the hearings he will find the testimony of the Chief of Staff.

Mr. SNELL. But was he questioned about this proposition before the subcommittee?

Mr. WRIGHT. The question arose.

Mr. SNELL. The chairman of the subcommittee said he was not.

Mr. WRIGHT. I did not understand the chairman to make any such statement as that. The Chief of Staff was there, and the hearings show he was.

Mr. COLLINS. I made no such statement.

Mr. WRIGHT. I want to say to my friend SNELL, and I do not know of any man in this House for whom I have higher respect, that this is all "tommyrot," for the Chief of Staff to say that he did not have a chance before the committee.

Mr. SNELL. I did not mean to say that he did not have a chance. I understood that he was not questioned on the proposition of reducing the officers of the Army.

Mr. WRIGHT. He was put upon notice the committee had this in mind.

Mr. SNELL. I understood the chairman of the subcommittee to say that he was not questioned upon it. Now, if I am wrong, I wish to be corrected.

Mr. COLLINS. No; I said just exactly the opposite.

Mr. SNELL. That he was asked about it?

Mr. COLLINS. Absolutely.

Mr. SNELL. What did he say about it?

Mr. COLLINS. I read excerpts from his testimony.

Mr. SNELL. What page is it on? Will you read it now?

Mr. BLANTON. Let the gentleman look it up for himself.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say for the benefit of my friend from New York, Mr. SNELL, as well as the balance of the membership, that we accorded the utmost deference to every official who wanted to come before our committee. We did not seek to cut anybody off. The statement was made here a few moments ago that Secretary of War Hurley said he could tell the committee how to save $25,000,000. He is attributed with making that statement before the committee. He made no such statement.

He came before the committee and said he had kept up with the hearings, he knew what the Chief of Staff had testified and he was content, that he did not care to make any statement.

Now, getting to the points in this bill. The immediate question before you is whether you will reduce your officer personnel from twelve thousand and some odd to ten thousand.

My friends, there have been too many officers in the United States Army for a long number of years, and the Army itself has realized it. I have always stood for a sufficient officer personnel because I believe it is proper to have them so that in time of an emergency they can quickly train the civilian population, but think about having practically one officer to every nine men in the Army.

My good friend BEEDY—and I have a warm affection for him—says that England has such and such an army, that Germany has such and such an army, and France, and so on and so on. Why, my good friends, I thought that was one of the reasons we were in this country, so as to get away from those old practices and customs of Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman entirely misunderstood the point I was attempting to make. I was attempting to show that our officer personnel in proportion to men in the Army is no higher than in any other army—that is, we are not maintaining an unusually high officer personnel. The gentleman sees the point, does he not?

Mr. WRIGHT. I may see it one way and the gentleman may see it in another way.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. GLOVER. Is that not one of the reasons why we are asked to give a moratorium on the debts they owe us—namely, that they are carrying such large armies?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes. Their armies are eating up everything.

Now, my friends, talking about this officer personnel in the Regular Army of the United States, there has grown up on that roll of officers what the Army calls a "hump." What does that mean? It means that as a result of the war, by taking in so many new officers, and right after the war, that "hump" has been created. It has become congested, so to speak, so that the boys down below can not get over it and get promoted as they ought to be. We all know that when a man enters the Army, especially when he becomes an officer, he has promotion in mind. That is laudable, it is commendable, and it is praiseworthy.

Now, what has happened? As has already been said, we have to-day lieutenants in the Regular Army of the United States over 60 years of age. Their military career is over. What incentive have they? What do they expect?

Then, again, we turn out annually some 1,200 or 1,300 West Point graduates. They go into the Army as officers. Do you know that those boys must stay there until 1949 or 1950 on account of this "hump" before they can get any promotion? That is discouraging to them.

Now, gentlemen, that is what we are trying to iron out here. What we are trying to get rid of is this "hump." Your committee undertook to do that, and it has provided a method by which a board will act. A formula was laid down and that was the age limit, thinking that would be the most certain and fair way.

Of course, it is understood that no matter what may be provided there will always be favorites. We understand there are those to whom partiality will be shown. That is nothing to the discredit of the board that is going to be appointed, because it is just human nature, and you can not get it out of them. Let me tell you that the Army itself did not want to exercise discretion about this thing. It is a delicate matter. In other words, suppose we Democrats were called on to reduce the number over here by 10. Would it not be a mighty delicate question with us as to who should be turned out? It would be the same way with this board.

Mr. BLANTON. Are we not getting so many generals in this House that we may soon have a "hump" in the House?

Mr. WRIGHT. I suspect so. Now, my friends, I say there is a question involved in the reduction of the officer personnel of the Army which far transcends the question of economy involved; it far transcends the dollars and cents which will be saved. It goes to the efficiency of the American Army, and that is the principal thing we had in mind.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I have referred to the statement made by the chairman of the committee, and it is as follows:

> Nearly all of us know it in more than a general way, and it seems to me, with the information before us, we could at least frame an appropriation bill without the aid of the Chief of Staff of the Army.

Mr. COLLINS. That does not contradict what I said. The gentleman is not reading from that part of my remarks where I showed that both the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff—both—were given an opportunity to state their views on the proposition to the committee.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The General Staff should not be permitted to write an appropriation bill.

Mr. SNELL. But you could get some information as to what will happen in the event certain action is taken.

Mr. BLANTON. The General Staff did not write this bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. And it is not going to write the next one. [Applause.] Now, my good friend McSWAIN comes forward with a proposition to reduce the same number but by a different method. I want to say I find no fault with the McSwain proposal if it will work, and I reckon it will. He wants to put it on efficiency and physical condition. That is his proposal. He wants to go by the records down in the War Department, the efficiency records, and all other kinds of records.

I can see how, with all the hedging provisions he has in his proposal there can still be favoritism exercised by the board. You can not keep it out. He has one thing attached to it that I am glad he put on and that is he makes it a crime for anybody to interfere in any way or to try to influence in any way this board which is to be appointed to effect these eliminations. He provides that you can send them to the chain gang if they do this. I suspect there will be some people put on the chain gang if they can prove it on them.

Now, getting away from the question of reduction of officers, there are two or three other points I want to talk about. Why, the idea of General MARTIN and General CHIPERFIELD and others talking about destroying the national defense act by the passage of this bill. How absurd and how ridiculous it is to talk about this bill, if passed, disrupting the Army of the United States.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two more minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I was trying to preserve Fort Benning.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes; Fort Benning is my baby and it is the best thing in the Army.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. And the gentleman is trying to break it up.

Mr. WRIGHT. No; I am not. I am trying to nourish it and bring it up as it should be. The gentleman can not scare the folks down there. There will not be one less officer attending Fort Benning as a result of the reduction of 2,000 officers. The gentleman can not fool me.

Now, what else do we do? Take the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. I believe in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and we have not destroyed the Reserve Officers' Training Corps in this bill. We have simply given them a vacation from their summer camp for the next fiscal year. All their other training is provided for.

I believe in the citizens' military training camps, and that is not interfered with in the least except during the next fiscal year they also have a vacation.

Take the Officers' Reserve Corps, that you have heard so much talk about here. Do you know who makes that up principally? There are over 80,000 of them, and that organization is largely made up of newspaper editors, lawyers, and industrialists, and they are complaining here that they can not live on $1 a day at the camp. Gentlemen, do you know what we are doing for them? We say that we will pay their expenses to the camp next year if they want to go there and we will pay their expenses back and we will give them a dollar a day while they are there for subsistence, and yet this is the very crowd that is sending all this propaganda here to cut down and curtail Government expenditures. In the name of reason, are they not patriotic enough for one season alone to go out and devote their time to this patriotic work without being compensated by the taxpayers? This is all they are asked to do.

Now, this is what we have done to the Regular Army and to the civilian components of the Military Establishment by this bill that my friend the general here says is going to disrupt everything. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, after listening to my friend who has just finished, the thought comes to my mind that the officers who comprise our officer personnel must read the debates on this bill with a great feeling of uncomfortableness. It appears to me, after listening to this debate, that the argument in favor of the reduction is that it is almost a crime to be an officer in the Regular Army of the United States. These men have a responsibility to perform just the same as we have.

Reference has been made to the distinguished gentleman from Oregon, our colleague, General MARTIN. I have heard many references to him by some of my friends in the past; and they ought to stop making them on the Democratic side, because he is a credit to this Congress and a credit to the Democratic Party. [Applause.] He is a pioneer in the Democratic Party of the great Northwest, and he is one of the pioneers in making the Democratic Party national. We are all trying here to make our party national, north, east, south, and west; and we can not do it by having men from one section of the country attaching high-type honorable men from other sections of the country, who are pioneers in the cause of the Democratic Party and coming from a part of the country where we seldom, if ever, have had any representation in the past.

This is my personal opinion. I do not think it is conducive to party welfare.

In discussing the present bill I am not impugning the motive of any man who differs from me. I think it is wrong in principle and in practice to make references to a man who has taken the position in this fight that his conscience has dictated, simply because he has been a Regular Army officer, willing to sacrifice his life for his country during the many years he rendered service in the past, or if a Member is in favor of the recommendations of the committee.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. General MARTIN is also one of the hardest working and most capable and most efficient Members of this body. I know from personal observation, as a result of sitting on committees with him. I am a Republican, and I say this for a Jeffersonian Democrat. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I have no argument with my friends who are fighting for this reduction, I realize they are actuated by the same motives that I am in opposing it.

I have looked this bill over in its entirety, and I see first a reduction of 2,000 officers. I see, second, the elimination of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps camps for one year; and we know next year that there will be a fight to continue this elimination for another year, and this will be used as a precedent if successful. I see the elimination for one year of the citizens' military training camps, which will be used as a precedent for the permanent elimination of the citizens' military training camps. I see an attempt to practically destroy the effectiveness of the Organized Reserves. I consider this in connection with the reduction in the officer personnel and the additional provision on page 60, which they have tried to put in our appropriation bills for the past several years, relating to the training of the boys attending schools where military service is compulsory by making it elective with the student body.

I take all of these together; I weigh them all together, and as I look over the Army to-day of 118,000 enlisted men and 12,000 officers, and consider the effect that this measure will have on its activities, and I can not escape drawing the inference that these recommendations will seriously affect our national defense. The recommendations of the committee, if adopted, will result in the impairment of efficiency, the morale, and the character of our national defense so far as the Army is concerned.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Does the gentleman know of any other instance where Congress tries to dictate to the State what it shall put in its curriculum for an educational institution?

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not care to get into that. The question is whether or not this is real constructive economy. I do not believe in economy at the expense of the impairment of any element of national defense, and the people of this country do not want that.

Even under the conditions which confront us to-day, and which makes economy necessary, the people do not want economy in any such way as will result in our country being in a defenseless position in the event of war developing in the near future.

Some people say, "Are we going to have a war?" We never expect war. The people of Europe did not expect war in 1914; we did not expect to go into the war in 1898. We did not think we would enter the World War until after the Lusitania was sunk.

In these days we have to be practical. We have got to be prepared for an emergency, and the price we pay for national defense, out of the Treasury of the United States, for the maintenance of an adequate Army and Navy is the price that we pay for protection. It is a premium that we pay for national protection, just as we pay a premium for insurance on our homes; just as we pay a premium for insurance of our automobile against accident, fire, theft, or collision; just as we pay a premium on our own life, so that in case of death we will leave something for our loved ones that we leave behind.

The expenses of adequate national defense is the price we must pay for our protection.

I recognize the argument of gentlemen who are in favor of the committee recommendations, that we do not want a large Army and Navy; that we have the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans to protect us. Nevertheless, the first thing an enemy would attempt would be to destroy our Navy. They would have to do that before they could attack us on land. In the event an enemy was successful in destroying our Navy, and enemy troops were landed on the Atlantic coast, their first effort undoubtedly would be to separate New York and New England from the rest of the country. Practically all of our industries are located in that area. If the attack came on the Pacific, an enemy would undoubtedly try to invade us from Mexico through Texas. In all probabilities the first attack on the Pacific coast would come through Texas, and on the Atlantic it would be by landing in New Jersey or Maryland, with an attempt to separate New York and New England from the rest of the country.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If they ever do that, the Texas Rangers down there will stop them. Where are we going to begin on economy? If the gentleman and his friends vote against every economy in this bill, does he not think that we will deserve the criticism the country is now giving us?

Mr. McCORMACK. The country does not favor economy which is likely to impair our national defense. Everything the gentleman says about the Texas Rangers is true. I am as proud of the Texas ranger as the gentleman is and as well acquainted with their history, but I am not quite so confident that there are enough Texas Rangers down there, brave and valiant though they are, to defend our country in event of an attack through Texas. We have to have an Army with good officer strength, as that is the foundation of our national-defense scheme; to maintain our present professional Army of 118,000 enlisted men, intended to be 260,000 under the national defense act; behind them our National Guard civilian body, and then the citizens' military training camps, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the Organized Reserve, in order to train those who have not had military training, in the event of war. We do not want war, but we can not ignore the fact that it is just as likely to come to-day as it has in the past. We are living in a practical world. This country has enemies, just the same as everyone has enemies. The best means of defense is an adequate defense which will enable us to take the offensive in case we are attacked. [Applause.]

I conclude my remarks by reading a letter received from Admiral Robert E. Coontz, retired. By the way, if any man is competent to discuss lack of preparedness, it is Admiral Coontz. There have been less than half a dozen officers of the Navy who have ever attained the rank of full admiral, and whatever Admiral Coontz has to say is as valuable a contribution to this debate as that which General Pershing might say.

He writes as the senior vice commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, composed exclusively of veterans of the armed services who have fought the Nation's battles in foreign lands and in foreign waters—a membership all of whom have felt the brunt of that lack of preparedness which has characterized our entrance into every war. That membership is opposed to any further breaking down of our national defense.

The letter of Admiral Coontz is as follows:

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Kansas City, Mo., May 10, 1932.

Hon. JOHN W. MCCORMACK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: It is a matter of much satisfaction to the Veterans of Foreign Wars to know that you have indicated your intention to oppose the provisions of the Army supply bill recently reported to the House of Representatives by the Appropriations Committee, which would so seriously impair the training of the Army reserve, including the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and the citizens' military training camps.

The plea is being made that the curtailment of these activities is but a temporary expedient required by the economic circumstances obtaining in the country to-day. The same forces back of such curtailment, mainly militant pacifism, have worked unceasingly to emasculate our national defense act since its passage. The curtailment of the reserve activities this year will be perpetuated in the following years, for history repeats itself.

In the 150 years of its national existence the United States has, by the command of its citizenry, engaged in six wars of major importance. In four of these it battled for its very existence. After each one it was said, "There will be no more wars." The sword was beaten into the plowshare and peaceful life was resumed with supreme indifference to the national security.

When the thunderbolt next fell thousands of our splendid young manhood with unparalleled patriotism went forth to unnecessary death, mutilation, and destruction of health from lack of even the rudiments of preparation—organization, training, and equipment.

Three years prior to the World War the American Congress had an opportunity to prepare against a war which was ever rolling nearer. Fearful of inviting a conflict, hopeful of inspiring a world at war by a noble gesture, they had done nothing to prepare for it. Thus, when war at last came to the United States, all was to be done. In a machine age the Army of the greatest industrial country on this planet had to be made by hand. Although war had become the most exact of sciences, the history of the American Expeditionary Forces is one long tale of improvisation; on the other hand, German, French, and Italian commanders had armies which had been in the making for decades. Their reserves and officers, staff and line, and noncommissioned officers, which are the backbone of the army, were well-nigh inexhaustible.

In order to prevent any war finding us in the impoverished condition which we were in at the outbreak of the World War, a national defense act, the first real military policy that the United States ever had, came into being. As a part of that act the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and the citizens' military training camps became indispensable parts of our Federal system. These should continue indefinitely in the future as common-sense insurance for the Nation based on the mortuary tables of our past history. Their mission is to inspire good citizenship and foster patriotism; to teach the men trained therein to be guided and led by constituted authority and to lead others by the same token; to confirm their inherent ideas of duty, honor, country; to initiate them into the elements of military training, or that they may be better citizens and real factors in case the land of their nativity called them to the colors.

Let us hope and pray and give our best efforts to avert any conflict in the future, but with the world in its present throes of anguish can any man say that such efforts will definitely preclude another war of major importance?

It is my opinion that the estimates provided by the Bureau of the Budget should be restored to the Army supply bill. These estimates were woefully low in themselves and contemplated such economies as were possible without too much impairment of our national defense.

It may be safely said that this organization, composed of veterans who have engaged in the Nation's wars on foreign soil and in foreign waters, will rally individually and collectively to petition the Congress not to go the way of pacifism and utter insecurity.

Very sincerely yours,

R. E. COONTZ,
Admiral, United States Navy, Retired,
Senior Vice Commander in Chief.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD].

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, growing out of the ghastly experiences of the World War, with all of its mistakes, costly to life and treasure, there was a fixed determination upon the part of the American people that the condition of unpreparedness for a proper national defense should not confront them again. If anybody misconceives the temper and mind of the Nation at this time upon the subject of preparedness, it occurs to me that for such a person there will be a great awakening. The American people will hold any group or any individual in public life to a high degree of responsibility if the system that was devised for national defense is impaired, lessened, or destroyed.

By the national defense act of 1920, after the war-time strength was dissipated, it was determined by the people of the Nation that there should be provided the framework of an Army that would be adequate and sufficient for the needs of the country in its hour of extremity. In the remarks I am about to make there is no contemplation upon my part that there will ever be need to use the American Army against the American citizen. And in my judgment any such use is unthinkable. A comprehensive scheme has been devised by the Congress without great cost to the country, based upon all the wisdom of the Nation, the precedents of the past and the history of the world, that has given by the national defense act the framework of an Army that should be sufficient for the national needs and that would be the pride and gratification of all if it had cause to be assembled for action.

In the national defense act of 1920 it was estimated that on the promotion list of the Army there should be 15,035 officers, distributed as follows:

Major generals	21
Brigadier generals	46
Colonels	599
Lieutenant colonels	674
Majors	2,245
Captains	4,490
First lieutenants	4,266
Second lieutenants	2,694
Total	15,035

The authorized strength of officer personnel of the United States Army as fixed by the acts of 1922 and 1926 provided a promotion list, as follows:

Major generals	21
Brigadier generals	46
Colonels	470
Lieutenant colonels	577
Majors	1,725
Captains	3,450
First lieutenants	2,667
Second lieutenants	1,974
Total	10,930

It is now proposed by the appropriation bill now under debate to reduce this officer personnel by 2,000. As a justification for such venture, it is said that it will remove the "hump" and will eliminate officers who are unfit for service on account of old age.

The whole history of the world from the dawn of civilization does not embrace or contain so foolish an effort as that now being made to destroy the effective defense plan of the Nation.

Let us see about these old men, these decrepit officers that we are going to eliminate from the Army by this bill. The numbers and ages of the officers proposed to be eliminated are as follows:

Age	Number
63	20
62	31
61	31
60	43
59	17
58	26
57	45
56	41
54	73
53	66
52	63
51	80
50	77
49	122
48	139
47	118
46	84
44	24
43	28
42	25
40	55
39	87
38	107
37	133
36	202
35	87

Average age, 46.

A consideration of this list will show how ludicrous is the claim that these officers should be eliminated because of old age, and how absurd it is to contend that they are tottering upon the brink of the grave. At the age of 35 some 87 officers are to be eliminated. Of those who are 36 years of age, 202 officers are to be taken from the active list and retired. Of the officers class that is 37 years of age, 133 are to be taken from active service. Of those who are 38 years of age, 108 officers are to be placed upon the retired list. The average age of all of these 2,000 officers is 46 years.

Can anyone justify the proposition that is now advanced to take these men, who are capable of many years of active service, from the active list of the Army and retire them, and pay them three-fourths of their base pay for the rest of their lives without requiring them to perform any duties in the Army or for the country. I apprehend that such a grotesque contention has never in the history of the country been advanced before.

It should be remembered that if these 2,000 officers are removed from active service that it is not proposed to fill their places, and in not filling their places you are not removing the "hump," nor are you making promotion any speedier or more easy.

Let us examine for a moment the character of the officer personnel that you propose by this bill to eliminate. You are going to retire 1 officer who has the medal of honor, 30 officers who have the distinguished-service cross, 43 who have the distinguished-service medal, 85 who have the silver star citation.

These 2,000 officers you propose to take from active service, eliminate and retire, are the brightest, most capable and best men in the Army.

In the framing of this bill some great intellect has the thought that in the officer personnel room must be made for the class which will graduate from the Military Academy in 1933. In order to do this, it is proposed to eliminate the following 200 officers, all of the grade of colonel, but some of whom have the temporary rank of major general, being chiefs of branches.

It can be seen that because of the provisions of this bill you will be eliminating Gen. John F. Preston, who is the Inspector General of the Army; Gen. Charles H. Bridges, who is The Adjutant General of the Army; Gen. Henry C. Whitehead, who is Assistant Quartermaster General; Gen. Francis Parker, who is Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs. You are eliminating men like Col. William K. Naylor, Chief of Staff of the Second Army Corps, and who in war time was chief of staff of the Thirty-third Division, American Expeditionary Forces, and Col. William C. Gardenshire, of the Quartermaster Department, who was the division quartermaster of the Thirty-third Division, American Expeditionary Forces, and afterwards corps quartermaster of the Ninth Army Corps, American Expeditionary Forces. You are also, under the bill as presented, displacing the following: Gen. Thomas Q. Ashburn, Chief of Inland Waterways Corporation; Gen. John W. Gulick, Chief of Coast Artillery; Gen. Harry G. Bishop, Chief of Field Artillery; Gen. Stephen O. Fuqua, Chief of Infantry; Gen. Guy V. Henry, Chief of Cavalry; Gen. Irving J. Carr, Chief Signal Officer; Col. Kyle Rucker, formerly Judge Advocate, Third Army, American Expeditionary Forces. All of these are among the outstanding officers of the entire Army.

There will also be eliminated in this list officers like General Foulois, who is Chief of the Air Corps of the Army and one of the outstanding airmen of the world.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. Has the gentleman overlooked the fact that there is a 5 per cent provision here, which will enable some of those men to be retained?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. No. I realize what the gentleman has in mind; and of the 2,000 officers to be retired, that leaves 1,900 who will be eliminated solely by reason of age. Under the provisions of the bill as it now stands, these 1,900 are subject to no discretion, but only the arbitrary rule that is set up in the bill.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I yield.

Mr. BACON. Further in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, in taking into consideration the 5 per cent, it will eliminate 79 officers who are marked "superior," 997 who are marked "excellent," and only 710 officers who are class B.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I sincerely thank the gentleman from New York for his contribution.

I have been furnished by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] with a table which is extremely interesting and shows the efficiency rating of the promotion list of officers who would be retired under the provision of the Army appropriation bill as introduced.

The table is as follows:

It will be observed that of this officer personnel 1,076 are "superior" and "excellent."

Now, it has been said that we have at the present time an excessive officer personnel. Let us look the situation squarely in the face. If war comes—and I can not say it too reverently, and any man who has had any military experience will say the same thing—if war comes, which God forbid, how utterly insufficient our officer personnel would be with a potential Army at war strength of 4,000,000. Approximately 10,000 officers are now on the promotion list. I have not recently seen the figures, but when we were ready to make an effective move against the enemy in the great World War our Army had an officer personnel of at least 200,000.

Under such conditions we would be 190,000 officers short, under the existing conditions. I do not have any idea how speedily you could supply the deficiency of 190,000 officers. I do know that under the national-defense plan you can not afford to reduce further the officer personnel by 2,000.

I want to call your attention to an actual condition that is very illuminating that arose in the World War. The Princess Pat Regiment, as brave a regiment of Canadians as ever lived, officered by just as brave men as ever trod in shoe leather, but who of necessity had no great experience, was decimated by not staying behind their own rolling barrage. Due to a lack of proper judgment they went into this barrage, and they were killed by scores. There is no man in this House who has any military experience who does not fully realize and understand that the fatalities among our men were greatly augmented by the lack of previous experience of our officers who, called suddenly to service, did the best they knew how. But that best was not good enough. For doing the best they could they are entitled to great credit.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] said that there is now 1 officer to every 9 enlisted men in the Army. That may be true if all you consider is the Regular Army, but I want you also to consider the conditions as they actually exist, and you can not afford to shut your eyes to them.

Composing the United States Army—and let nobody misquote me—and its various military components outside of and beyond the 118,000 regular troops, we have a large force, all of which in a certain sense now constitutes the Army of the United States. It is maintained without any great expense to the Government. Its composition is as follows:

Enlisted men, Regular Army	118,750
Philippine Scouts	6,500
National Guard	187,000
Organized Reserves	108,000
Reserve Officers' Training Corps	127,000
Citizens' military training camps	37,500
Total	584,750

On this basis it will be observed that there is but 1 officer to 48 trainees and soldiers of the Army of the United States.

I desire, in connection with my remarks, to submit some data that have been prepared by the War Department to cover this situation. It is as follows:

RESULTING CURTAILMENT OF ARMY ACTIVITIES

8. In framing the national defense act it was the intention of Congress to embody in law the following essential elements of national defense:

a. To provide an Army of the United States consisting of three components—the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Organized Reserves.

b. To organize this Army into the military units necessary to form the basis for a complete and immediate mobilization of the Nation's manpower in a national emergency.

c. To make provision for the mobilization of the Nation's material resources and the maintenance of war reserves as an element in mobilization.

9. To carry out the responsibilities imposed by the act, the Regular Army is called upon to furnish officers for all manner of important duties beyond the limits of the Regular Establishment itself. The number of officers now assigned to duty with the civilian components, about 1,650, is considerably below the number demanded. The proposed reduction in the commissioned personnel of the Regular Army, combined with the relief of all retired officers now on active duty as is also contemplated by the bill, will necessarily result in a drastic curtailment of the activities of the Army in administering the forces of the National Guard (187,000), the Organized Reserves (108,000), and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps (127,000).

The national defense act originally provided for a corps of approximately 18,000 regular officers. Appropriations in recent years have limited this number to an average of 12,000. The War Department has reported to Congress that the minimum number of officers required in the Regular Army to enable it reasonably to carry out its mission is 14,063. This number is required to enable reasonable provision to be made for the training of the civilian components; to maintain a small, balanced, mobile force for emergencies; to man in part the seacoast defenses of the continental United States; and to allow reasonably adequate garrisons in the overseas possessions.

10. Even with the force of 12,000 officers now provided, the calls for assignments to duty with the National Guard, the Organized Reserves, and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps can not be met, while the present shortage of officers with troop units of the Regular Army is a matter of grave concern to the War Department. A reduction of 2,000 officers and the relief of the 134 retired officers now on active duty would force the War Department to curtail many essential activities to an extent that would practically nullify the provisions of the national defense act. A cursory survey of the situation indicates that the following reductions in the numbers of promotion-list officers now assigned to highly important duties would be necessary:

	Number	Per cent
Foreign garrisons	336	20
Duty with the National Guard	229	50
Duty with the Organized Reserves	227	50
Duty with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps	308	50
Instructors at service schools	88	30
Students at special service schools, except flying schools	414	50
Students at general service schools	157	50
Instructors at the U. S. Military Academy	38	20
Officers on recruiting duty	42	50

11. There are, at the present time, no more officers assigned to overseas garrisons than are necessary properly to officer the units assigned to those garrisons. A reduction in the number of officers at these strategic outposts would seriously handicap their powers of resistance. The importance of maintaining these defenses upon an efficient basis is vital in the present state of world affairs. Their reinforcement in an emergency can not be counted upon. Each of them has its own strategic and tactical mission confined to restricted area. No use could be made of these garrisons in the continental missions assigned to the Army.

12. The service schools are highly important elements of our military system. The World War demonstrated the necessity of these schools for the training of officers. The small number of regular organizations which provide actual experience with troops makes them of increasing importance. This necessity is augmented by present-day specialization and the rapid development of means and methods of warfare. Just as trained officers are keystones in defense, the schools are keystones in the officers' training.

13. The proposed reduction in the non-promotion-list branches will necessitate a drastic contraction in the activities of the component corps of the Medical Department and of the Chaplains' Corps. Medical Department activities with the National Guard, Organized Reserves, and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps will have to be practically abandoned, and a very considerable reduction will have to be made in the present contribution of the Medical Department toward the care of veterans.

14. The report of the committee on the bill states that its provisions will not materially lessen the available officer strength in the event of war or national emergency, because the officers who are retired will continue to be subject to recall to active service. This statement entirely disregards the fact that the regular officer, in order to be prepared to discharge his duties under the exacting conditions of modern warfare, must be in a perpetual state of training and instruction. Officers on the retired list who would be compelled to engage in commercial activities in order to supplement their retired pay and support their families could not be expected to keep themselves abreast of the military profession.

SAVING EFFECTED

15. The report of the committee on the measure contains an estimate of $3,814,823 as the annual saving that would result from the retirement of 2,000 officers. This is an average of approximately $1,900 per officer and exceeds the estimates of the War Department. However, accepting the committee's estimate, the saving effected amounts to less than 3 per cent of the amount expended for pay of the Army. Such a saving is entirely insignificant in comparison with the damage which would be done to the national defense and the injurious effect upon morale of the commissioned personnel of the Army if the proposed legislation were adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, may I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Before I address myself to this particular proposal, Mr. Chairman, I shall refer briefly to the remarks that have been made here this afternoon about the committee not having consulted with General MacArthur and the Secretary of War relative to reducing the commissioned-officer strength of the Regular Army. I wish to reiterate a former statement that I made a day or so ago on the floor of this House that I wrote the Secretary of War a letter in December asking how much money might be taken off the War Department appropriation bill and where, provided 2,000 Army officers were eliminated. When General MacArthur testified I interrogated him on the subject; and when the Secretary of War, Mr. Hurley, came before the committee, after I had written to him, if you please, I asked him about economies in the War Department, and he said, quoting from page 1103 of the hearings:

If I knew a place where we could cut another dollar off this budget without impairment of the efficiency of the establishment, I would cut it off, and I would tell the chairman where to find it, and tell him we did not want it.

Now, then, we have heard men say economies will be pointed out by the War Department in lieu of those proposed by the committee. Why did they not tell us of these economies during the hearings? Gentlemen, you simply can not further reduce the military appropriations without touching personnel.

Let us see what the President of the United States has said about reducing military and naval expenditures. You have heard the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, state a conversation he had had to-day with the President of the United States.

That statement made by the President of the United States to-day is in line with every statement he has made in the past with reference to economies in the Military and Naval Establishments.

On the 23d day of July, 1929, President Hoover, in an economy appeal, said:

The American people should understand that current expenditures on strictly military activities of the Army and Navy constitute the largest military budget of any nation in the world to-day, and in a time where there is less real danger of extensive disturbance to peace than at any other time in more than half a century. The hope of tax reduction lies, to a large degree, in our ability to economize on the military and naval expenditure and still maintain adequate defense.

There is a statement by the President of the United States, made just after the close of the fiscal year 1929, during which, according to the President's own figures, there had been an expenditure of $676,141,317, divided between the Army and the Navy.

Now, let us see what the estimated expenditures are to-day, for the fiscal year 1933, as given us by the Director of the Budget; not appropriations, but expenditures, for it was expenditures the President used at that particular time. What do they aggregate? Counting exactly what we are going to spend, as estimated by the Budget, and omitting the reduction that already has been made in the naval appropriation bill and the reduction proposed in this bill, we find they aggregate $666,000,000, as compared with $676,000,000, which were the expenditure figures for the fiscal year 1929 at the time the President made his statement in July of that year. Just $10,000,000 less!

Now, listen, gentlemen. Figuring the then purchasing value of the dollar at 100, and figuring the present purchasing value of the dollar at 140, which it is, what do we find as the estimated expenditure total for the War and Naval Departments of this Government for the next fiscal year? Listen, if you please, $932,400,000. Yet men will rise on the floor of this House and say that the pacificists of this country approve this bill as it comes from the committee! If pacifists are saying that, I should say we need not be unduly alarmed by such pacifists. Nine hundred and thirty-two million four hundred thousand dollars! I want to know if the membership of this House desires to give this country a military and naval budget in times like these comparable to what is being proposed in some quarters here to-day?

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. No; I am very sorry, I can not yield.

With reference to this particular paragraph of the bill, we all know that a second lieutenant ought to be a first lieutenant in 3 years, that he should become a captain in 10 years, a major in 17 years, a lieutenant colonel in 22 or 23 years, and so on up the line. With the officers in the establishment as it is now, it is an impossibility for the young officers to receive proper promotion. They become overage before they can pass into higher grades and assume duties commensurate with their ages, and duties which the country would expect of them in the event of an emergency.

You are not helping the military-defense power of this Nation by making it impossible for the younger men who are going to fight our next wars, in the event we have them, to be advanced in grades.

You are not helping the situation by allowing them to remain in a position where they are going to be incompetent to perform the duties you will expect of them.

What did the Interdepartmental Pay-Personnel Board, of which General Simonds, one of the greatest officers we have had in this country, was the chairman, say about this matter? Let me read from the report of that board:

It can not be expected that any increase in attrition that can be produced by lowering the retirement age or liberalizing voluntary retirement will result in sufficient elimination to produce a desirable rate of promotion. A certain number of compulsory removals from the active list will still be necessary, and these removals, in order to produce the desired effect, must be confined largely to the officers appointed on or before July 1, 1920; i. e., to the pre-war and World War groups. * * * The proper method for obtaining the number of compulsory terminations of active service that are necessary after the resources of retirement for age and physical disability and voluntary retirement have been exhausted is by having a representative, disinterested, and impartial board select annually the officers who are to be removed from the active list in order to bring about the total attrition that is required. Provided such a board is allowed due latitude in the discharge of its task, the result so obtained can be expected to be in the best interest of the service.

This is not a statement from a layman. This is a statement from the report of the Interdepartmental Pay-Personnel Board, the membership of which, representing the War Department, was appointed by the War Department itself. That board stated that there would be need to resort to forced attrition.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I am sorry, but I can not yield.

What does General MacArthur propose as a solution of the stagnated-promotion situation? General MacArthur stars certain officers who are not considered as overage for their grades and he leaves unstarred the rest of them. The starred men, in effect, constitute, under his plan, the promotion list of the Army. The rest of them are dead weight. His plan admits that they are dead weight. Every time a starred officer goes up he takes with him every unstarred officer in front of him, which means that they are carried along as dead weight.

This amendment and the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] provide that these overage officers, or at least those of them who have not satisfactory fitness reports, shall be retired from service, but in that status they will be just as much available to the Government as they are now. We are not losing the services of a single one of them.

What does the national defense act provide as far as officers and men are concerned? It provides for 15,035 officers and 280,000 enlisted men. Applying these figures to our peace-time Army of 118,750 men it gives us 6,377 officers, or slightly more than half the number we have now. All of the so-called higher-ups in the Army approved the ratio as between officers and men at that particular time.

Then consider, if you please, the forces we maintain in our foreign possessions, like Hawaii and Panama, our troops stationed in China, and so on.

We will find that the proportion of officers to men on duty now at those places is about 1 to 20. Applying that proportion, we would need 5,900 officers instead of 12,000 plus.

What did General Pershing say in his book about the organization of the American Expeditionary Forces? A division consisted of 979 officers and 27,082 men, 1 to 30; for a brigade, the ratio was 1 to 35; and for a company, 1 to 41. That would give us, according to the division figures, for our Army now, 3,900 officers. On the basis of 1 to 35, 3,390 officers instead of 12,000 plus, and on the basis of 1 to 40, 2,190 officers. So after these 2,000 are taken off, we will have a large surplus of officers according to any figures you can name.

Now, then, what about the British? I have stated heretofore that the British have about the same number of enlisted personnel in their regular army and in its different civilian branches as we have—approximately 550,000 men. They have 23,079 officers; we have 129,792. They have an officer for every 23.9 men, while we have an officer for every 4.9 men.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one additional minute. Then, with regard to the proportion of officers to man power in the other countries, we find that France has an officer to every 18 plus men; Italy has an officer for every 21 plus men; Japan, 1 to 14 plus men; Great Britain, 1 to 15 plus men; and the United States, 1 to 9 men, counting its Regular Army only.

In conclusion, gentlemen, let me say this: The amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN], I think, is an exceptionally well-drawn amendment. It contemplates a different basis for separations, but its primary purpose is the same as the provision proposed by the committee, and it is my intention to accept it as the committee amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, in reading the bill which is before us for consideration and the report of the committee thereon the first thought that came to my mind was that we must be approaching the millenium; that we were about to witness the days "when the war drums beat no longer and the battle flags are furled, in the parliament of man, the federation of the world." When we face the facts, however, and remember that to-day more than any time since the end of the World War we see on the horizon of this Nation and all over the world a spirit of national and international unrest and disturbance we must realize that notwithstanding the universal cry for economy the United States of America must take steps to see to it that its national arms of service—the Army and the Navy—are equipped to sustain the national manhood and honor of this great Nation. [Applause.]

When we read this bill and find that it calls for the elimination of 2,000 Regular Army officers, the virtual wiping out of our Organized Reserve, of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the citizens' military training camps, and the National Guard, I say to you we are going too far and we must call a halt on any such proposed legislation, no matter who demands it, if we are true to our oaths of office and intend to preserve the integrity of this Nation. [Applause.]

I use as my own words the language which I saw in an editorial printed day before yesterday, and which reads as follows:

> There is one small economy project that is loaded with dynamite—the proposal to reduce the officers of the Army by 2,000 and to cut out the funds for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps entirely and for the citizens' military training camps for a year. This is not economy. It is lunacy. The country learned what such economy meant in 1917. It is still paying the bill for it and will continue to pay that bill for the next 50 years. It does not want the mistake repeated in 1932.

We are now the seventeenth nation of the world in the organization of our military forces, and we are the only nation among those 17 which is attempting to-day to cut down its national defenses.

The President of this Nation told us on March 26, in his message on balancing the Budget, in effect that "we ought to keep ever in mind the American citizen"; and he said, "we should not further reduce the strength of our defense." [Applause.]

The Army has been fair in this matter. It has reduced its budget by over $38,000,000, and to-day the representatives of the Army say they were willing to cut off $10,000,000 in subsistence of the Army, clothing and equipage, housing, barracks, and quarters, as well as Army transportation. So if we should adopt these measures we will save nearly $50,000,000. I think we will thus perform our duty to our country in the matter of economy so far as it applies to this bill, and at the same time we will preserve our national integrity and our national defense, which as American citizens is our greatest obligation. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I am going to support the McSwain amendment if it comes to that point, because I believe that is the proper way to eliminate whatever officers should happen to be eliminated.

Frankly, I think it is ridiculous to go ahead and try to cut off 2,000 officers at this time. I think there are some overage officers who are out of place and who are not able to render service. I think perhaps we might be able to cut down our officer personnel by 500 without doing any damage, and I believe this would help to clean up the situation. But now is not the time to cut down our officer personnel to the point of weakening national defense.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. It may be worth while to put in the RECORD the fact that the witness quoted by the gentleman from Mississippi, General Simonds, did not recommend any cut in the officer personnel such as that now proposed by the committee.

Mr. TABER. That is true. At the same time, there are so many officers above what might be called useful age in the Army that we would not be weakening our national defense if we cut the number down by something like 500, in my opinion, because we have first lieutenants who are 61, captains who are 64 and 61 and 60, and you can not tell me that you need officers of that type who are above useful service age. They can not be rendering efficient service and they could not be of use if we got into trouble. I hope we will not have such trouble, but I believe we could cut down a little, although I have no idea we could go as far as the committee has proposed and cut the number of officers 2,000 at this time. You would then eliminate captains who are as young as 40, and I do not believe we ought to do anything of that kind.

I am going to offer a substitute, when the time comes, to cut down the number approximately 500. I do not think we ought to go a bit farther, because you would be cutting into the useful, efficient personnel which we need to build up by the influx of new men in the organization—graduates of the Military Academy.

I believe there are other places in the bill where we can cut more than enough to make up for what we might save on this proposition.

I believe in economy. I believe in cutting down expenses just as far as we can, but we must not cut them at the expense of absolutely necessary national defense.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman discuss for a moment the question of the recall of these officers? I have been troubled a good deal about that.

Mr. TABER. These officers would go on the retired list, of course. They could be recalled if the Government wanted to recall them at any time in case of emergency. They would not be on the pay roll except for retired pay, but they or General MARTIN or any other officer who is on the retired list could be recalled to active service in time of emergency, and at the time of the late war they were so recalled in very large numbers and put at work where they could serve useful purposes.

Mr. FIESINGER. Then they would not be lost to the service. That is the point I am making.

Mr. TABER. I do not think they would be lost to the service entirely.

Mr. FIESINGER. Would their efficiency be lessened?

Mr. TABER. Their efficiency would not be lost to the service. Of course, if you reduced the personnel of the active Army too far, you would get to the point where you could not make your Army effective and use it the way it ought to be used. This is especially true with the large number of officers that have to be detailed in increasing number to the Air Corps, and, of course, you know that in our Army we have practically 1,200 officers in the Engineer Corps, which is a service not comparable with any military service of any other government.

Mr. FIESINGER. Is the gentleman going to offer an amendment to the amendment bearing out his idea?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I offered the amendment to restore the 2,000 officers to the commissioned personnel of the Army because I conscientiously believe that to eliminate these 2,000 officers is not in the interest of economy and, furthermore, is not in the interest of our national defense. It would be a permanent reduction in the officer personnel of the Army. We are told these men would go on the retired list and that we could call on them at any time, but we know that these men when they are on the retired list are not kept in that state of preparedness and training that is necessary to make an efficient Army officer, and to that except their retirement is going to be a dead loss to the Government.

It is planned to retire them at three-quarters base pay and three-quarters longevity pay. For that they return no service to the Government. In many cases we will have to hire civilians to do the work, and it is my opinion that it will cost more in actual dollars and cents to retire these officers than it will to keep them on the active list.

There is one thing that has surprised me in the debate this afternoon, and that is the attitude of several members of the Military Affairs Committee who have told us about the hump of World War officers preventing the promotion of younger officers. That hump has existed since the World War.

For the past 12 or 14 years that hump has been there and one of the problems of the War Department has been to try to remove it and give an opportunity for promotion.

Bills have been sent to the Military Affairs Committee and suggestions made as to how to remove the hump.

In the hearings on the War Department appropriation bill the chairman of the subcommittee asked the Chief of Staff what his solution of the problem was, and he said, "My solution is the bill that was approved by the Secretary of War eight months ago and sent to the Military Affairs Committee."

This is a legislative proposition, because it changes the substantive law relating to matters of this kind. Why, then, has not the Military Affairs Committee come in with a legislative bill instead of coming here and advocating legislation—because that is the effect of it—legislation on an appropriation bill?

I do not care whether under the technicalities of the Holman rule this language in the bill is in order or not, the effect of it is to change the fundamental law relating to national defense, and is, therefore, legislation.

I am surprised to see the gentleman from Alabama and other members of the Military Affairs Committee come before the House to-day and advocate this change of substantive law as an amendment on an appropriation bill.

If we are going to do that, if we are going to legislate on appropriation bills, why not discontinue all the other committees of the House of Representatives and give the Appropriations Committee full power and jurisdiction over all matters of legislation that come before this House?

I am a member of the Appropriations Committee, but I do not believe in anything of that kind. That is why I am opposed to legislation on appropriation bills, because it is not the right way to do things.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Did the gentleman oppose the Anthony bill in 1922?

Mr. BARBOUR. I was not a member of the Appropriations Committee in 1922.

Now, there is nothing further that I care to say on this matter. I think it has been fully presented to the House. I want to reserve two minutes of my time, because I promised some time to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It has been suggested that there are other places in the bill where we can effect economy.

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Wherein can we bring back economy if we do not start here?

Mr. BARBOUR. On flood control and rivers and harbors.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Anything else?

Mr. BARBOUR. That is enough. Right there you can more than cover the additional cost of putting back these officers. It will cost nine and a half million dollars to put back the 2,000 officers, the Organized Reserves, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the citizens' training camps—$9,500,000 is what it will cost. Sixty million dollars is appropriated in this bill for rivers and harbors, and not a dime has been cut off that appropriation. We can cut $10,000,000 off rivers and harbors, leaving $50,000,000, as much as was carried annually up to two or three years ago. The flood-control provision of the bill amounts to $32,-

500,000. At the rate we are going now that whole flood-control project will be completed within four or five years. A large part is completed now. We can save a few millions off that for the fiscal year 1933 and not take any chances of seriously interfering with the work whatsoever. These reductions in these two items could be for one year alone. That is only a suggestion that I make. We can take $10,000,000 off rivers and harbors for one year and from $5,000,000 to $8,000,000 off flood control for one year, and no harm will be done and we will be saving more money than this bill proposes to save by the elimination of these officers and the other activities which so undermine and weaken our whole system of national defense.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Where is the other $6,000,000 that we were to get out of the bill that the President talks about?

Mr. BARBOUR. I have suggested $15,000,000 more than the proposed cut so far as officers are concerned.

Mr. BYRNS. Do I understand that it is the idea of the gentleman that in this time of unemployment, when we are talking about appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars to afford employment, that he would cut $10,000,000 or more from the river and harbor and the flood-control appropriations?

Mr. BARBOUR. Everything proposed to be done in this bill, so far as cuts are concerned, will result in unemployment.

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, no; not with reference to these 2,000 officers. They are retired, and not one of them will receive less than $1,800 a year for the remainder of his life, and he is subject to call whenever there is a demand for his services. How is the national defense hurt in that way?

Mr. BARBOUR. All through the bill there are cuts in appropriations for supplies, automobiles, trucks, equipment of various kinds, and one thing and another which will result in unemployment. You can not make those cuts without causing unemployment. We can save money a whole lot better in the way I have suggested than in the other propositions in the bill. The gentleman has asked where further savings can be made and I have told him. The effect on employment would be no different than in the cuts that he advocates.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What reduction does the gentleman suggest for flood control in the Sacramento River?

Mr. BARBOUR. We will take our share of the cut.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. But what is that share?

Mr. BARBOUR. It is the same proportion that the gentleman will take on the Mississippi River.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I suggest to the gentleman that the figures of the Engineer Corps show that every million dollars of river and harbor appropriation represents 60,000 labor days, and every million dollars of flood-control appropriation represents 77,000 labor days.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The Republican leader, the self-appointed spokesman for the President, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], on the floor of the House, when indicating that the President was in favor of retiring these 2,000 officers, also told us that the British Regular Army officer strength was 5,000 officers, when the fact is that the British Regular Army officer strength is 22,322, and the French Regular Army officer strength is 32,317.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I just want to make this statement, in conclusion.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. No; I can not yield. I have not the time. The gentleman from Tennessee speaks of causing unemployment. There are cuts and reductions all through this bill for manufactured articles, such as trucks, automobiles, and other things, that are going to result in less employment. The effect can not be otherwise. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for one and one-half minutes.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, in the one minute and a half all I desire to say is that I am in favor of keeping these 2,000 officers in the Army. I believe you can not make an officer over night; and I do not believe, because a man has reached the age of 45 or 50 years, that his brain has deteriorated to such an extent that he should be eliminated. I think we need these men in the service. Furthermore, we are not dealing here with just a small regular Army, but we are dealing with a proposition where, if war were declared to-morrow, we would need to officer and commission a potential army of 4,000,000 men, already arranged for under the plans of the General Staff of the War Department. I hope the House will not vote to eliminate these 2,000 officers. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, during the period of my membership in the House, I have found that its Members are not greatly interested in personal recriminations, but they are always willing to carefully weigh and give thoughtful consideration to facts and information pertinent to the subject under discussion. I regret that my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Oregon, General MARTIN, so far forgot himself as to be just a little ungracious in his reference to the Committee on Appropriations and to the chairman of its subcommittee handling War Department appropriations. Knowing him as I do, I believe when he has had time to carefully read his remarks of last Tuesday he will of his own volition eliminate some of the things said by him in the heat of the debate.

There can never be any sound reason why a Member, no matter what his professional training may have been, should feel called on to exclaim, "My God, it makes one's blood boil to think that such things could be done," referring in this instance largely to the fact that the Committee on Appropriations should permit one of its members to quote with approval the opinions and conclusions of world-recognized military authorities, who were mere captains or majors, on the subject of how to modernize an army so as to improve its mobility, its communication, and efficiency.

Let me here say, however, that primarily my reason for asking this time was to call attention to certain statements made during the discussion of this bill by the gentleman from Oregon, General MARTIN, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD], in which they expressed very deep interest and real anxious solicitude for World War emergency officers and others commissioned in the Regular Army after July 1, 1920, pursuant to the national defense act as amended by House bill 12775, approved June 4, 1920—the direct effect of which act was to provide liberal promotions for many regular officers to high grades, especially to the grades of major, lieutenant colonel, and colonel.

It was most pleasing to hear the wonderful tribute which the gentlemen from Oregon and Illinois paid to and the solicitude expressed by them for these deserving emergency officers—the large bulk of whom are still in the grades of captain and lieutenant, with absolutely nothing to look forward to in the future for an Army career, unless remedial legislation reducing the number of officers in the manner suggested by the McSwain amendment is adopted.

Let me briefly summarize what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] said, so you may understand how he and the gentleman from Oregon feel toward the deserving emergency officers, whom he refers to as men who performed well their duties to their country in the World War. Said he:

> The Army needs the influence of these men who came from civil life. You can not well dispense with these men. Their loss would be great and irreparable. They started out in the profession of arms, and they had a right to anticipate promotion with increase of pay—

Note those words—

that they might stay in the service until retiring age.

From other statements I am justified in concluding, I think, that the gentleman from Oregon, General MARTIN, is in hearty accord with these views so eloquently expressed by the gentleman from Illinois.

To both of these gentlemen—former distinguished Army officers of high rank—let me say that certain high officers of the Army who prepared, supported, and had passed the national defense act as rewritten and amended by H. R. 12775, approved June 4, 1920, were certainly not in sympathy with your evaluation of the worth of these emergency officers, which is unmistakably evidenced by their unfair interpretation and administration of such act and by their proposals to forcibly eliminate this group from the service subsequent to June 4, 1920, as I will later show. What occurred after regular officers, by virtue of this act, were rapidly promoted to permanent rank in high grades, when viewed retrospectively, furnishes another striking example of the old, old human story of men, clothed with authority and high responsibility, yielding to the selfish impulse of appropriating everything possible for themselves even at the cost of grave injustice and wrong to others equally as deserving.

Listen to some record facts cleverly interrelated, and see if the statement just made is not supported by reasonable deductions therefrom. As early as the latter part of 1919 great affection and solicitude were expressed for the enlisted personnel by officials in the War Department, who appeared before the House Committee on Military Affairs, and urged an increase in the pay of the enlisted personnel. A bill was afterwards reported carrying substantial increases for the enlisted personnel for a definite length of time, and passed by the House, the materiality of which will later appear. When the bill reached the Senate a substantial bonus increase for the same period was added for the officer personnel, which was agreed to in conference, effective about January 1, 1920.

In the meantime a drive was being put on for rewriting in a large and liberal way the 1916 national defense act. The need for more officers, it was pointed out, was imperative. Need for strengthening the National Guard, for enlarging the Reserve Officers' Training Corps units, and for making liberal authorizations for Reserve Officers' Training Corps, citizens' military training camps, and reserve officers' training camps were urged. In this connection it was proposed to increase the officer personnel of the Army to approximately 18,000, which, it was explained, would provide permanent commissions for more than 5,000 meritorious and capable war emergency officers, which, by the way, was the effective argument making possible the amendment of the national defense act, approved June 4, 1920.

Under it all emergency officer commissions were to be surrendered, and the provisions of the act were cleverly prepared so as to create favorable public interest, due to many popular groups it affected, yet full control and a wide discretion were vested in the department, through its regular personnel, as to all promotions, appointments, and assignments to grades of those eligible for permanent commissions.

Now, this amended act of June 4, effective July 1, 1920, increased the number of major generals from 4 to 21, of brigadier generals from 19 to 46, and largely increased the numbers in all grades on the single promotion list, authorizing in such grades the following: Colonels, 599; lieutenant colonels, 675; majors, 2,245; captains, 4,490; first lieutenants, 4,266; second lieutenants, 2,064.

It seems now needless to say, except for the benefit of the uninformed, what happened, namely, those in the Regular Service were rapidly advanced to the higher grades, nearly all captains becoming majors—though some had very limited commission service—and the grades of lieutenant colonel and colonel were immediately also largely augmented. The great bulk, however, of that large number of capable and deserving emergency officers to whom the gentlemen from Oregon and Illinois have so tenderly referred were commissioned in the grades of captains and lieutenants, in which grades most of them are still found, and will continue to be found unless Congress seeks partially to right some of the wrongs done by giving approval to the committee's recommendation, with the perfecting amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN], chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House.

The emergency officers—so dear to the hearts of many regular officers up to the time of the passage of the amended act of June 4, 1920—were commissioned in the low officer grades, thereby becoming stepping-stones on which the regular officers were lifted to permanent positions in the higher grades to which attention has just been directed.

Mr. McKenzie, a former chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee, well portrayed the situation during the hearings held on the service pay bill in 1921, when he said:

You are aware of the fact that there are hundreds and hundreds of young officers who have received very rapid promotion, and some of these older officers in both the Army and Navy that I see sitting around in the room probably served 10 or 15 or 20 or 25 years before they reached the point where they were drawing the pay that some of these younger men are drawing after two or three years.

Let me again ask my friends, the gentleman from Oregon and the gentleman from Illinois: Who will now undertake to justify this unjust, unfair treatment of these deserving emergency officers by the selfish use of authority wielded by those who became the immediate beneficiaries of its exercise?

Then what happened? In 1922 the scene shifts, and another story of human selfishness is written, and may I say to the gentleman from Oregon that while you can justly point with pride to the high skill and strategy shown by officers of the department in the preparation of war plans, yet never have they employed greater skill and strategy than that shown in the preparation and passage of personnel legislation on the Hill. In 1922, I repeat, the scene of 1920 changes. The Army now wants an adjusted pay bill carrying permanent increase pay for the officer personnel.

The groundwork was laid for this 1922 drive in the previous acts of 1919 and 1920, to which reference has been made, and which served to largely increase the officer personnel, granting temporary increases in pay to both officer and enlisted personnel and providing for the appointment of a joint committee of the Senate and House to report in 1922 on the matter of a permanent adjusted pay bill. Then, as now, there was much talk in Congress about effecting economies, so the first thing the Army and other affected services did was to announce that the permanent adjusted pay legislation, which they favored, would be so drawn as to appropriate less money in the fiscal year 1923 than would be required under existing permanent and temporary bonus legislation. Listen to the strategy employed to accomplish this result.

They first announced, for reasons you can readily surmise, an earnest desire to include in the adjusted pay act the Public Health Service, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and to make liberal provision for our citizen soldiers—the National Guard. Next, they sought to further popularize this legislation for increased pay by introducing in the House a bill to reduce the officer personnel of the Regular Army by 2,000 or more (the increase of 1920 having now effectively served its purpose). Another bill, known as the Pershing bill, looking to a reduction in the officer personnel, was also then pending in the Senate, both of which bills were frequently alluded to in the discussion of the pay bill as promising large economies. Suffice it to say, an examination of these bills will disclose that their enactment and enforcement would have forcibly eliminated from the service on very scant pay a large number of the 1920 emergency officers—the commissioning of whom had served to elevate to permanent commissions in high grades a large number of the regular officers.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] and I were members of this joint committee of the two Houses, and he is familiar with the legislative history to which your attention is being called.

Let me here disabuse the mind of the gentleman from Oregon of the thought that the national defense act of 1916, and as amended in 1920, was written by some distinguished Member in this or the other legislative body. The draft of those laws, very technical as you will find, was drawn by Army officers. The same is equally true of the adjusted pay bill of 1922, to which your attention will be briefly called later. These bills were drafted and approved by and had the hearty support of high Army officers, otherwise they never would have passed.

Now, by way of summarizing, note: Army officers strongly urged increase of officer personnel in 1920, using as an argument the possible rewards to deserving emergency officers that would follow. They also urged increase of pay for the enlisted personnel. After the passage of these bills they took in thousands of emergency officers, but in what grades, you ask, were they commissioned? Let the records answer—in the grades of captain, first and second lieutenants, and in these grades you will largely find them now, and as to many of these legislation has even been asked by the War Department to forcibly eliminate them.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. They put emergency captains 40 years old down under Regular Army second lieutenants.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is absolutely correct. The same unfair treatment was also shown in the adjusted pay bill toward emergency officers. Read a letter from Colonel Ely, of the Judge Advocate General's Office, appearing in the hearings on the pay bill, in which he discusses this matter very fully. Great care was taken, however, to provide for the pay of the Regulars, especially in the grades of majors, lieutenant colonels, and colonels, all of which grades were top-heavy because of the rapid promotions following the enactment of the 1920 act.

Talk about hardships, as did the gentleman from Illinois in reference to officers now in the grades of major, lieutenant colonel, and colonel, let me briefly state how liberal the pay bill was to these grades. Mr. McKenzie has been quoted, you will recall, as having referred to the rapid promotion of many of the young officers who reached in two or three years a grade which older officers had found it necessary to wait years for.

In the adjusted pay bill prepared by officers then in the service the first thing done was to increase the longevity pay from 40 to 50 per cent of the base pay and to strike out a limitation of $1,000 on the longevity pay of officers in the grades of major, lieutenant colonel, and colonel. In brief, the base and longevity pay of officers in the grades of colonel, lieutenant colonel, and major with 30 years' service by the adjusted pay act were increased from $5,000 to $6,000, $4,500 to $5,750, and $4,000 to $5,250, respectively. The effect of this was to increase the maximum retirement pay for a colonel, $750; for a lieutenant colonel, $937.50; and for a major, $937.50.

There were a large number of colonels and many lieutenant colonels and majors, because of the different types of service other than commission, which they were allowed to claim, while denying it to others, were immediately entitled to the maximum increases in pay and allowances under the terms of the adjusted pay bill of 1922.

This same bill which allowed the officers then in the service to claim all types of service, other than commission, to increased longevity pay, also provided that such service could be used to increase an officer's base pay by giving him the base pay of the next higher grade or of the next pay period.

To illustrate, three different base pays were provided for majors, ranging from $2,400 to $3,500, to which longevity increases of 50 per cent should be added, at the rate of one-tenth for every three years of service (all types of service counting for certain officer groups. For majors, eight different rates of allowances were also provided in addition to base and longevity pay, ranging from $219 to $2,097. Similar complications and variations will be found in the grades of lieutenant colonel and colonel.

Let me again emphasize that all types of service can be claimed under the 1922 adjusted pay bill, seifishly written for and in the interest of certain officer groups then in the service, but such rights and privileges, the act provides, die with such officer groups, and, after July 1, 1922, all officers commissioned in the service can only count for pay and longevity regular Federal commission service.

Attention has been called to the assurance given, in order to pass the adjusted pay bill, that it would take less money in the fiscal year 1923 out of the Federal Treasury than would be taken under existing pay schedules, plus the temporary bonus; and here is how, with that same lack of fairness for others, it was accomplished: The pay of the apprentice seaman in the Navy and of the enlisted man in the Army, for whom great solicitude was shown by officers in 1920, was cut from $33 and $30, respectively, per month to $21, and the pay of second lieutenants in the Army and corresponding grades in the other services were cut $200 each (few then in this grade, now a large number).

The money thus taken from the enlisted personnel, from second lieutenants, and officers without dependents supplied the pool to meet the increases in pay and allowances for the higher-ups, to which attention has been called.

There are many still in the House who joined me in opposing this adjusted pay bill, which was a mere temporary makeshift, full of unjust discriminations. Among those opposing it was the present Speaker of the House and the present chairman of the Appropriations Committee. Those who opposed the bill then stated that the Army and other allied services would themselves repudiate it in the near future; and if you will read the report of the Interdepartmental Pay Board, under date of July 19, 1929, you will find that this prediction has come true.

That part of such report should interest both the gentleman from Oregon, General MARTIN, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CHIPERFIELD, who have expressed such keen interest and sympathy for deserving emergency officers, where it refers to "a large and heterogeneous World War hump of over 5,000 officers," and again "these World War officers constitute the outstanding abnormality in the promotion list." This board, in the suggested legislation which they submitted, following a like recommendation of Army officers in 1922, proposed to get rid of surplus officer personnel by forcible eliminations, thereby partially relieving the hump so as to accentuate the flow of promotions. They were anxious in 1920 to get the emergency officers in to receive rapid promotions for themselves, then to get them out in 1922 so as to give promise of economies and to increase the pay of those who remained in.

Under leave to extend, I will append copy of letter written by the joint committee of the House and Senate to the President, under date of June 30, 1930, emphasizing the importance of legislation to correct the inequalities with respect to promotion which then and still obtain.

In conclusion may I say that nothing has been suggested that will serve in a better, larger, and more effective way to partly correct and adjust the inequalities, the injustices, and unfair discriminations imposed on officers commissioned in the service after July 1, 1920, than what is proposed in the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN]. On Tuesday last the gentleman from Oregon, General MARTIN, in a very complimentary way referred to "the learned chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, Mr. McSWAIN" and expressed a willingness to follow his leadership in the drafting of legislation relative to this important matter. I now ask the gentleman from Oregon to read his language, appearing in Tuesday's RECORD, and by his vote on the pending amendment show his abiding confidence as he assured us he had in the leadership of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN]. [Applause.]

The McSwain amendment does what high officers in the Army will privately tell you is so imperatively required at this time, namely, it opens the door for promotion to efficient captains and lieutenants of the World War, gives real hope to the young blood of the Army, and partially corrects the unjust discriminations imposed on emergency officers by the defense act of 1920 and by the pay act of 1922.

Who is there who will not say, "Help the Army; lend encouragement to the young blood of the service and to those worthy emergency officers who have been the victims of unjust discriminations"?

Mark this prophecy: If the McSwain amendment is adopted and the views of military experts so ably outlined in his opening statement on this bill by my friend the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] are sympathetically studied and followed, this session of Congress will mark a new day in the advance of our Army along the lines of contentment and ever-increasing efficiency.

We have had some to rise in the House and in an ironical vein assume to jeer and scoff at the constructive thoughts respectfully and modestly submitted to the House for its study by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]. In that connection I have only this to say, that from the days when we have the most meager records of man's doings down to the present the scoffer has occupied side lines along the path of human progress. As some one has truly said, "The scoffer never travels with progress. He pays little homage to any creature save himself, and regards his opinions as being the decree of a court of last resort." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks, I am appending copy of letter directed by the joint committee to the President of the United States under date of June 30, 1930, from which the following is quoted:

We find as we study this report and various data that have come to us that the remedy, at least in part, for many of the ills complained of lies not in pay adjustment, but in promotion adjustment. We find that in the Army and Navy the large numbers of emergency officers permanently commissioned following the war are themselves not advancing as rapidly as would be desirable under a well-ordered scheme and that they are hindering the orderly advancement of officers subsequently commissioned. Under the longevity arrangement which now obtains some of them receive compensation in excess of that received by officers senior to them by from one to three and, in fact, four grades.

Obviously, therefore, the remedy in such circumstances certainly, in part, is promotion legislation, but the Interdepartmental Pay Board, designedly or not, proposes the expedient not only of allowing these existing high rates to continue, but actually of increasing them, thereby, in order to arrive at a graduated pay table without overlapping, permitting such rates to dictate its whole pay schedule with the result that the Interdepartmental Pay Board's proposal is widely out of harmony with any possible program that it would seem we would be justified in indorsing or that we might reasonably expect to be received favorably.

A promotion program that would correct the situation with respect to these emergency officers seems of paramount importance and must, in our judgment, precede pay adjustment. * * * By establishing a uniform pay schedule, parity is not accomplished if one man advances right through the several grades and another, commissioned at the same time and for reasons beyond his control, has his progress constantly impeded so that the age limit overtakes him somewhere along the line. Necessarily, there ensues a difference in career earnings, unless recompense be effected through the medium of longevity increases.

Such a course ignores the worth of a job and gives extra compensation in the absence of added duties and responsibilities. It is this principle of the present pay law that in large measure is responsible for the high rates recommended by the Interdepartmental Pay Board. It is unsound and tends to discourage those qualities inherent in men who are striving to forge ahead, since it removes or lessens the incentive for advancement in grade if attended by little or no additional compensation.

In view of the foregoing it is our firm conviction that adjustment of the inequalities which now obtain with respect to promotion should be the first step in pay adjustment and that pay revision should follow and be predicated upon a promotion scheme as nearly uniform as may be consistent and practicable. Pay relief, both as to form and measure, very largely depends upon the correction of those promotion problems which contribute to the urge for pay relief.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment which is at the Clerk's desk and which has been read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McSWAIN: Beginning on line 11, page 11, strike out all that part beginning with the word "convene" after the word "shall" and ending with the word "shortage" on line 17, page 12, and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"First select the general officers to be removed from the active list of the Army, and from the general officers remaining on the active list the President shall convene a board of five general officers, who shall select the officers to be removed from the active list in consequence hereof, and the action of such selection board as to the officers to be removed from the active list shall be final: Provided further, That any officer may be retired upon his own application if same be filed prior to September 1, 1932: Provided further, That the selection by the board aforesaid of the officers to be removed from the active list shall be made solely on the basis of comparative ability, efficiency, and physical fitness, as disclosed by all now-existing efficiency reports and other pertinent official War Department records, and that no removals hereunder shall be made of officers permanently commissioned in the Air Corps or the Judge Advocate General's Department, and that any person who, by any means whatsoever, shall attempt to influence or interfere with the action of said selection board in its work of reduction with respect to the retirement of any officer of the Army, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, at the discretion of the court."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that two amendments have been offered, one by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] and one by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN]. The gentleman from California has presented an amendment which in part is perfecting and which in part strikes out a large portion of the paragraph. The gentleman from South Carolina has offered an amendment which is entirely a perfecting amendment. It seeks to perfect that part of the bill which the amendment offered by the gentleman from California proposes to strike out. In the opinion of the Chair, the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, being entirely a perfecting amendment, would take precedence over the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARBOUR. As I understand the ruling of the Chair, we now vote on the McSwain amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. If that is adopted, then we will vote on the amendment to strike out most of the paragraph under consideration, which I have offered to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. BARBOUR. That is, to strike out the paragraph and make certain changes in the amounts, not striking out the whole paragraph but a large part of it and making changes in the amounts which will result in putting the 2,000 officers back in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that I accept the McSwain amendment.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TABER. The McSwain amendment, as I understood its reading, does not affect the language of the bill with reference to the number of officers.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry, the Chair will state to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. In order to have no misunderstanding, if the McSwain amendment is adopted, that amendment substituting language not now in the bill, would the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, which strikes out language which would be substituted by the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Under those circumstances, in the opinion of the Chair the amendment offered by the gentleman from California would be in order. The amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina is a perfecting amendment and would not preclude the striking out of that part of the paragraph, if the committee so decides.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, in order to make it clear, the entire language proposed to be stricken out by the gentleman from California is amended or perfected, as we sometimes say, by the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the Barbour amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment to the Barbour amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER to the Barbour amendment: On page 8, line 19, strike out the figures "$31,833,477" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$30,283,477."

In line 23, on page 8, strike out "$8,545,011" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$8,495,000."

On page 9, in line 4, strike out the figures "$9,447,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$10,300,000."

In line 14, page 9, strike out the figures "$6,224,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$5,800,000."

In line 15, page 9, strike out the figures "$5,928,389" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$5,728,000."

In line 22, on page 9, strike out the figures "$137,042,204" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$135,671,204."

On page 10, line 1, strike out the figures "$136,242,204" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$134,871,204."

In line 21, strike out "eight thousand nine hundred and thirty" and insert "ten thousand four hundred and thirty."

Page 10, line 24, strike out "seventeen" and insert "twenty."

Line 25, strike out "thirty-seven" and insert "forty-four."

Lines 25 and 26, strike out "three hundred and eighty-four" and insert "four hundred and six."

Page 10, line 26, and page 11, line 1, strike out "four hundred and seventy-three" and insert "four hundred and ninety-nine."

Page 11, lines 1 and 2, strike out "one thousand four hundred and eleven" and insert "one thousand four hundred and eighty-nine."

Line 3, strike out "two thousand eight hundred and twenty-two" and insert "two thousand nine hundred and seventy-nine."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] for the information of the House.

The Clerk again reported the Barbour amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARBOUR) there were—ayes 129, noes 130.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. COLLINS and Mr. BARBOUR.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 135, noes 141.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read down to and including line 14, on page 13.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LANHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 11897, the War Department appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. OVERTON, until May 30, on account of official business.

Mr. GOSS (at the request of Mr. TILSON), on account of illness.

Mr. GIBSON, for one week, on account of important business.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 382) making an additional appropriation for printing and binding for Congress for the fiscal year 1932.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 382

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for printing and binding for Congress, including the same objects and under the same conditions specified under the appropriation "Public printing and binding, Government Printing Office, 1932," contained in the legislative appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, if I may say a word in explanation, the legislative appropriation bill which passed the House a few days ago carried an appropriation of $500,000, which was to be made immediately available. I hold in my hand a letter from the Public Printer in which he says that unless this $500,000, which was carried in that bill and has been approved by the House, is made available by May 16 there will be no money left with which to print bills and do the other printing for the Congress, including the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

This will not add one dollar to the appropriation, because if this resolution is passed the $500,000 will be taken out of the legislative bill. The resolution simply makes the money available now, and is necessary because it is evident the legislative bill can not pass the Senate for probably 10 days or 2 weeks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand, then, that if this joint resolution passes both bodies the $500,000 item in the legislative bill will be eliminated?

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, yes, undoubtedly.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Have the economy doctors in the other body had a chance to operate on this appropriation and reduce it 10 per cent?

Mr. BYRNS. I do not think this is a proper subject for the "economy doctors."

Mr. SCHAFER. The distinguished economy doctor from the gentleman's own State has indicated that every appropriation should be reduced 10 per cent.

Mr. BYRNS. We will send the resolution over and let them doctor on it, if the gentleman is willing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

PERMISSION TO FILE REPORT

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file at this time a supplemental concurrent report together with an illustration on the Patman bonus bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WHO IS FOR ECONOMY?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, most of the big newspapers of the country have used very intemperate language toward Congress, some of them calling the Members "imbeciles" and "traitors." Many of the men in this Congress have served here for years with some credit and distinction, and it does not seem likely that they have suddenly become as bad as they are described. By no stretch of the most partisan and distorted imagination can this Congress be charged with present conditions and with the fact that there is now a deficit in the United States Treasury of $2,500,000,000, and that there was a deficit last year of about $1,000,000,000. When did it become imperative that the Budget must be balanced and that "uncertainty is disastrous," as stated by the President in his late message.

There is the Bureau of the Budget whose duty it is upon direction of the President to make a detailed study of the departments and establishments for the purpose of enabling the President to determine what changes, in the interest of efficiency and economy, should be made in the business methods, the coordinating of activities and the regrouping of services in the various departments, boards, and bureaus, as well as to determine what appropriations should be made. The result of such study by the Bureau of the Budget shall be reported to the President, who may transmit the same to Congress with his recommendations. There are many high-salaried clerks and experts in this bureau who may thoroughly and carefully study the problem of consolidation, reorganization, and elimination of boards and bureaus, and report to the President. This study has not been called for by the President and, of course, no such report or recommendation has been made by him to Congress. In view of the existence of this law for years and of the further fact that the President has not availed himself of its provisions, and again that boards and bureaus have increased in number and expense during his administration at an unprecedented rate—in view of this, one wonders just when he reached the conclusion that he should "reorganize and consolidate and eliminate unnecessary Government bureaus and establishments."

At the beginning of this Congress the President submitted his Budget, the estimated amount of money necessary to run this Government for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1932. This Congress has already reduced the appropriations below the amount requested by the President in his Budget estimate by more than $160,000,000. His recommendation in December was that Congress should appropriate $160,000,000 more than has been appropriated, and now Congress gets a lecture on economy. The President now says that his estimate of the cost of Government and that the amount he recommended to Congress five months ago was $331,000,000 too high, and immediately the newspapers and some of the people are surprised and disgusted at the "imbecility" and "inefficiency" of Congress. Every effort made by Congress to cut the appropriations of the executive departments has been met by determined opposition from the heads of those departments who are the President's official household. Now because Congress has cut the appropriations much below the recommendation of the President, and done it over the protest of his official advisers, some of the newspapers and a few others throughout the country are utterly disgusted and extremely alarmed at the outrageous raids made upon the Treasury by Congress.

The recent economy measure which passed the House carried an estimated saving of $40,000,000, which, with the $160,000,000 cut in appropriations already made, makes a saving in governmental expenses of $200,000,000 for the year 1933, that being the expected saving upon the basis of which the last revenue measure passed the House.

It is a matter known to all that estimates of governmental expenses are presented to, and the revenues are provided by, the session of Congress preceding each fiscal year. The estimates for the fiscal year 1931 were presented by the President to the first session of the Seventy-first Congress, and that Congress, which had more than a hundred Republican majority, made the appropriations for the fiscal year 1931, which fell short about $1,000,000,000 and left the country with an unbalanced Budget in that amount at that time. We heard nothing about an unbalanced Budget then. The President again presented his estimate on Government expenses for 1932 to the second session of the same Congress. That same Congress made appropriations which will leave the United States Treasury at the end of this fiscal year, July 1, 1932, with a deficit of over two and one-half billion dollars. Everybody knew that a year ago, but nothing was said. If an unbalanced Budget alone meant "disaster," this country would have been sunk beyond recovery a long time ago. Do not misunderstand me. I am in favor of balancing the Budget as soon as it can be done by reduction of expenses and by just and fair taxation. It does seem that there is undue agitation about the Budget for next year in view of its condition for the past two years.

In the Sunday Star—Washington—May 8, there appears this interesting information. In a headline is this: "Bipartisan Program Mapped at Conference." In the body of the article it is shown who were present at the bipartisan conference. It reads as follows:

> Those who sat down with Mr. Hoover and Mr. Mills in the Lincoln study were Vice President CURTIS and Senators WATSON, of Indiana; SMOOT, of Utah; REED, of Pennsylvania; BINGHAM, of Connecticut; DICKINSON, of Iowa, along with Walter H. Newton, the presidential Secretary who deals with Capitol Hill.

This was truly a bipartisan gathering. The President; the Vice President; the Secretary of the Treasury; the Republican leader in the Senate, who said concerning the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill after its passage that it would bring prosperity and that the industrial skies would be bright in 60 days; SMOOT, the author of the present tariff law that has reduced our commerce to the vanishing point and driven American capital into foreign countries; REED, of Pennsylvania, who recently decried constitutional government and expressed the desire for dictatorship by declaring the country needed a Mussolini; BINGHAM, whose connection with the famous Grundy and the Manufacturers' Association was so intimate during the building of the Hawley-Smoot tariff wall as to give him much unfavorable publicity; and DICKINSON, of Iowa, the keynoter of the Hoover convention to be held in Chicago on June 14; Newton, the political Secretary to the President "who deals with Capitol Hill," which expression implies a rather broad field of activity. At least he is the same representative of the President who was on the floor of the House during the discussion of the economy measure recently passed, using his official and political influence against the bill. It will be noted that none of those great Republican Senators, NORRIS, BORAH, LA FOLLETTE, JOHNSON, or BLAINE, was called in, to say nothing about the Democrats who were not at this nonpartisan conference.

It is recorded that the meeting lasted an hour and a half; that political matters were not discussed, and that their endeavor would lead to bipartisan cooperation to secure the ends sought. That must have been a wonderful meeting, with never a word political. That is just the kind of crowd in which "mum" would be the word on politics. These high priests of special privilege in a great bipartisan conclave devising ways to increase the cost of stamps on first-class postage, put a tax on the smallest check, and impose a sales tax upon the consumers and laboring men of the country in an effort to balance the Budget which this same bunch, by reason of legislative inability and administrative inefficiency, have put two and one-half billions in the hole. That is the same crew that scuttled the ship, and now the country is surprised and astonished that the House of Representatives can not overnight put the ship on even keel. Where was this distinguished group of nonpartisans when board after board was created and the expenses were mounting higher and higher? Where were they when the huge deficits of 1931 and 1932 were accumulating? Bipartisan conference! Oh, ye gods!

Why not tell the truth about it. The administration is playing politics, trying to discredit the House of Representatives. Suddenly the alarm is sounded and the metropolitan newspapers and certain industries throughout the country take up the cry that this House of Representatives is about to ruin everything.

Early in this session I made some remarks on "Economy in Government," and I have tried to stand by that principle just as far as possible consistent with efficient Government service. The agencies and personnel of the Government can not be destroyed. There has been no question in my mind that the expenses can and should be reduced. That this Congress has already made such reduction to the extent of over $200,000,000 is no small accomplishment. It is known and recognized by everybody that over half of our Government expense is a fixed charge which can not be changed without absolute destruction of our credit.

The economy bill as passed was not what I hoped it might be. I voted at every stage of the proceedings to effect all the savings possible, and am ready to do so again. In many cases I was in the minority. I do not now seek to impugn the motives or impeach the character of anyone who did not vote as I did. Having served for two years on the great Committee on Naval Affairs, I am friendly to the idea of maintaining an adequate Navy, and I yield to no man in my desire to provide proper national defense; but it was my belief that a consolidation of the Army and Navy into one department would result in saving many millions of dollars, and for that reason I supported that proposition. All of my Democratic colleagues from Missouri did the same—M. A. ROMJUE, RALPH F. LOZIER, J. L. MILLIGAN, J. B. SHANNON, C. C. DICKINSON, R. D. JOHNSON, W. L. NELSON, CLARENCE CANNON, JOHN J. COCHRAN, JAMES F. FULBRIGHT, and WILLIAM E. BARTON. This was the big item of saving in the bill. The majority of the House thought best, I assume, in the interest of national defense, to keep the departments separate even at the expense of many millions of dollars.

For the past three months I have devoted most of my time to the study and to the hearings on the so-called home-loan bank measure, which has for its purpose the creation of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and 12 Federal banks with branch banks and with a great array of high-salaried officers, agents, and employees; an institution to place the Government squarely in the banking business in full partnership with certain financial agencies, the Government furnishing the capital. This measure provides for the expenditure of $125,000,000 by the Government, besides the appropriation of $500,000 as a preliminary administration fee. This measure was before a subcommittee of which I am a member. I am opposing the bill with all the energy and what ability I have, because there is not a dollar's worth of good in it for the home owners, in my opinion, and it sets up another nation-wide army of expensive officers and agents and another set of bank boards at the expense of the Government and the people. This measure has the unqualified support of this administration which is bringing all its influence to bear to secure its passage. It is against these powerful political and official influences that I am contending day and night. Yet we are told we should follow the President's program of economy. The above is one instance of his economy program and of his insistent desire not to eliminate or consolidate boards and bureaus, but to create others.

Why all this talk about economy and the elimination of boards in the face of this persistent determination on the part of the President to set up another costly banking system throughout the entire country. And this in addition to the fact that this Congress set up the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which is designed to take care of all mortgage-loan institutions that are provided for in this proposed bank measure. Much solicitude for big financial institutions, but the man on the street seems to have been forgotten. The average annual cost of government under this administration with Mr. Hoover in charge is almost one-half billion more than it was under his predecessor and is an increase of over 636 per cent of the average annual cost from 1900 to 1917. Why not have the facts? Why not be fair?

It may have been a mere coincidence, but almost immediately after an outburst of a number of New York stock manipulators expressing a lack of confidence in Congress and amazement at its failure to balance the Budget and reduce expenses and restore confidence the recent blast came from the President; and then at once the chorus was taken up by certain interests throughout the country. The stock gamblers and manipulators, who are more responsible than any other class of people for destroying confidence and bringing this country to the brink of ruin, are a fine set to cast aspersion upon anybody, and it is to be regretted that the President has followed their lead.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—FREEDOM OF THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from New York, Mr. ROBERT L. BACON, recently wrote an article on the PhHippines, published in some papers and since incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for May 9, 1932, pages 9871–9872. As one of the 47 who voted against the Philippine independence bill, H. R. 7233, recently passed in the House of Representatives by a vote of 306, the points developed by him in the article appear logical from his standpoint and his previous stand on this issue.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] starts with a complaint that the passage of the bill was effected after a limited time for debate, or, as he puts it, "under a drastic gag rule." Since several papers have also harped on this point, I wish to comment upon it.

I have been in Congress long enough to know that because of the large membership of the House of Representatives some rule limiting debate has to be observed or the parliamentary situation would be chaotic. In a very true sense every rule in the House is a gag rule. Unlike the United States Senate, the time allotted to a speaker is limited. No Member may speak continuously for an unlimited period on the floor of the House on a given subject or measure. I repeat, for the sake of emphasis, that all rules under which the House of Representatives operates are gag rules, differing only in degree or extent, and this is true whether the majority be Republican or Democratic.

In the Seventy-first Congress when the tariff bill, probably the most important measure considered, came under a gag rule precluding the submission of amendments. It was a rule sponsored by the party of which the gentleman [Mr. BACON] is a member. During this Congress, one of the most important bills (H. R. 11499) "A bill to restore and maintain the purchasing power of the dollar" was approved under a suspension of rules. This was done while the majority in the House is of a political complexion different from that of the gentleman's party. More recently still, the bill appropriating millions of the people's money for the widows and orphans of World War veterans was likewise approved under exactly the same conditions as H. R. 7233. In the discussion of these three measures, the RECORD fails to disclose opposition of the gentleman from New York to what he terms a "gag rule."

There is less valid reason for the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] to complain of the rule in the case of the Philippine bill than there is in the case of the three other important bills referred to and others which I could mention. The Speaker of the House of Representatives on Friday, April 1, 1932, announced that the Philippine bill was to come up the following Monday, April 4. On the day designated, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE], chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, asked unanimous consent for the consideration of H. R. 7233, known as the Philippine independence bill, with two hours of general debate—

> one-half to be controlled by the ranking member of the minority opposed to the bill, and that for the purpose of amendment in the Committee of the Whole the substitute committee amendment may be considered by the Committee of the Whole as an original bill.

Who objected to this procedure? It was the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON]. The record bears me out in this statement, as may be seen in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for April 4, 1932, page 7393.

The gentleman from South Carolina then asked consent that the bill be given a privileged status to be considered under the rules of the House. Who raised the objection? It was again the same gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON]. The following excerpts from the RECORD bear out this statement:

> Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be given a privileged status, to be considered under the rules of the House of Representatives.
> The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that this bill be given a privileged status, to be considered under the rules of the House of Representatives. Is there objection?
> Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I object.
> Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?
> Mr. BACON. I will reserve my objection.
> Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, I understood that the gentleman from New York only reserved the right to object to the original request.

I would like to say to the gentleman that we are very anxious to give all the time possible to the discussion of this bill, but I might say that under a rule, to be obtained for the purpose of considering this bill, it would be impossible for us to get over two hours of general debate and then consider it under the 5-minute rule, where it would be subject to amendment.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the gentleman that there are many Members not present to-day who are very much interested in this matter.

Mr. HARE. The only thing to be gained by objecting to the bill to-day would be to delay it, because we could not expect to get more time under a rule than is contained in the request made at this time.

Mr. BACON. It would at least give a number of Members who are not present to-day an opportunity to be here. It would also give a great many Members interested in this subject a chance to examine and study the bill and read the hearings.

Mr. HARE. I might say to the gentleman that these hearings have been printed for three weeks; the report has been filed for upward of two weeks, and notice was given on last Friday that we would make this request to-day.

Mr. BACON. The gentleman well knows we have been very busy on tax matters for the past three weeks.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to point out to my colleague from New York that this Philippine question has been pending before Congress ever since I have been here, during the last 14 years. The committee has held hearings, the hearings have been printed. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 7393.)

Commenting upon this attitude another distinguished gentleman from New York, Mr. LAGUARDIA, addressing his colleague, had this to say:

* * * I can not reconcile the gentleman's position of suggesting that this is "gag" and in the same breath recommending a rule. I hope my colleague will permit the House to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. We can discuss it there, and, finally, make good a solemn promise that is in the platform of both parties. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 7393.)

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] likewise said on that occasion:

Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] to the fact that in yesterday's paper there was an interview from him of Saturday, showing that he knew as early as Saturday about this matter coming up to-day, and showing what he intended to do about it this morning; and if the Speaker were to recognize the gentleman from South Carolina to move to suspend the rules, the gentleman would have but 20 minutes' debate on the side, whereas now, by agreeing to the unanimous-consent request, the gentleman has the advantage of having two hours' debate, giving one hour on the side. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 7393.)

The Speaker himself said:

* * * If this request were granted, then the Consent Calendar would be called for two and a half or three hours, when the Chair would recognize the gentleman to move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill under the general rules of the House of Representatives. It is then within the power of the House to limit debate or extend it to 12 hours, or 14 hours, or limit it to 2 hours or 1 hour. In case objection is made, it is the intention of the Chair to recognize the gentleman from South Carolina not later than 2.30 or 3 o'clock this afternoon to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The Chair has undertaken to give the House a full opportunity to consider this bill under the rules of the House of Representatives, and if it declines to give this consent, the Chair is going to recognize the gentleman to see whether the membership of the House wants to pass this bill to-day under suspension of the rules or not. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 7394.)

No one thus is more responsible for the parliamentary situation under which the Philippine independence bill was taken up than the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON].

I have gone into this point at some length in order that it may not be used as a smoke screen for the purpose of minimizing the importance of the favorable action of the House on the Philippine independence bill by a vote of 306 to 47, a majority seldom recorded in the annals of legislation.

The descriptive portion of the article and the factual statements based upon statistics need not be commented upon. I wish to record my appreciation for the recital of progress made in the article which, in my judgment, really argues in favor of the grant of independence by the United States rather than against it.

The arguments put forth by the gentleman from New York against the House action are by no means new. He and others who think like him have made the most of them in the past to forestall action. He is, of course, entitled to think that the vote of his colleagues on the Philippine independence bill was folly. I prefer to attach more wisdom to the combined judgment of 306 Members representing both the Republican and Democratic Parties.

It is apparent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] and I continue to hold divergent views on this question. I respect his views and I have no fault to find with his conclusions, commencing as he does with a hypothesis which I believe erroneous. Notwithstanding this view of mine regarding his stand, I must, in all sincerity, express my appreciation for his objection in the House, because I think he had unwittingly helped hasten action by his opposition. After all, what is needed at this juncture is action and not interminable discussion.

I am of the opinion that the enactment of the Philippine independence bill (H. R. 7233) would mean:

First. The redemption of America's plighted word;

Second. The satisfaction of an age-long aspiration of the Filipinos;

Third. A new renaissance in Philippine life;

Fourth. New faith in America on the part of the peoples of the Far East;

Fifth. An adjustment of American-Filipino relations upon a more lasting basis; and Sixth. A definite triumph of peace in international and interracial dealings.

I close reiterating my recognition of the sincerity of views of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] and my appreciation of his frankness in expressing them. He has long showed interest in the Philippines. He was once a member of the Committee on Insular Affairs and has paid my country the honor of a visit. He is very well known in the Philippines, for in the Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, he presented H. R. 12772 entitled "A bill to create within the Philippine Archipelago a jurisdiction to be known as the Moro Province, and to provide a government therefor." That bill was given wide publicity in the Islands and careful consideration on the part of the members of the legislature. The bill was distinctive in that opposition was universal and unanimous on the part of the Filipinos.

Then as now he erred (1) in assuming that there is an irreconcilable division between the Filipinos of Luzon and Visayas and the Filipinos of the southland, (2) in unduly giving importance to the Philippines as a property and as a dumping ground for surplus products, and as a source of supply of products, and (3) in not giving adequate recognition to the promise of America and to the universal demand of the Filipinos for their freedom and independence.

I was a member of the Philippine Senate when the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] submitted his bill, H. R. 12772, on June 11, 1926, designed to effect the dismemberment of Philippine territory, and I discussed its provisions. To demonstrate how diametrically opposed our views are on this issue, I hereto append the address I delivered on the floor of the Philippine Senate on that occasion.

The address discussing the so-called Bacon bill (H. R. 12772) follows:

Mr. President, I rise this afternoon to analyze briefly the main provisions of a bill presented before the Congress of the United States entitled "A bill to create within the Philippine Archipelago a jurisdiction to be known as the Moro Province and to provide a government therefor," and to register a protest against a bill which, if enacted, would be highly inimical to the social, educational, political, and economic well-being of the people of the Philippine Islands.

I shall start by saying that this measure, commonly known as the Bacon bill, is based upon an erroneous assumption of the existence of a division and enmity between the Filipinos inhabiting Luzon and the Visayas group and the Filipinos of the Southland.

It has been the fashionable practice on the part of those who wish the Philippines retained or those who want to further their imperialistic designs ever and always to harp upon a supposed irreconcilability of elements constituting the Philippine population. I say that this is an erroneous assumption, not only basing my assertion upon what we, the Filipinos know, but basing my contention upon authorized testimonies of American scientists and writers.

Dr. Merton I. Miller, when he was chief ethnologist of the Bureau of Science, testified to the common ancestry of the Filipino people, coming as they are from a common Malayan stock, and clearly pointing out that there exists no difference between the average Ifugao or Bontoc, or the Moro, or the Tagalog, or the Ilocano, or the Bisaya, or the Pampango. Doctor Miller said:

"Dress an average Bontoc or Ifugao man in the clothes worn by the Tagalog, cut his hair as the Tagalog cuts his, and not one man in a thousand could pick out the Bontoc or Ifugao men from a company of Tagalogs. With few exceptions this statement might be made about any of the people of the Philippines. We recognize a Moro by his peculiar clothes and his close cut of hair. We distinguish an Ifugao by his unique way of cutting the hair and certain characteristic features of his dress. But no man can distinguish the average Iloco from the Pampangan, the Pangasinan from the Bicol, or the Tagalog from the Bisaya. From the extreme northern end of the archipelago to its southernmost limits, with the exception of the few scattered Negritos, the people of the Philippines, pagan, Moro, and Christian, are one racially. There is some reason for believing that they migrated into the islands at two different times. But in all probability they came from the same general region and have a common ancestry."

The underlying homogeneity of the Filipino people also has been recognized by various American writers. I wish to be permitted to read an excerpt from the work of Le Roy, who says: "That the native stock of the Philippine Islands is Malayan is one of those things that have been recognized 'always, everywhere, and by all.' But in the writings, especially of recent years, so many fantastic strains of blood have been introduced into the Archipelago, and so many purely hypothetical and often unreasonable conjectures as to diversity of tribal origin have been evolved in the treatises of library workers, or whilom globe-trotters, that the underlying homogeneity of the inhabitants of the Archipelago has often been obscured." And he closes his testimony by saying that the "racial stock of the Philippines is quite homogeneous."

Dr. David P. Barrows himself, who was chief of the Philippine Ethnological Survey and a director of education, was convinced, to use his own words, "of the essential unity of the Filipino people."

I therefore maintain, Mr. President, that this measure is based upon an erroneous assumption of a supposed difference between Filipinos of the Visayan and Luzon groups and the Filipinos of the south, because it seeks to create a separate government for what the author is pleased to term the "Moro Province."

This measure, Mr. President, is obnoxious especially from the American point of view. It violates one of the cardinal tenets upon which American democracy rests. The American Government is based upon the theory of the separation of powers. This bill, Mr. President, is based upon a concentration of powers. I prove this statement by calling attention to sections 201, 204, and 301 of this measure.

Señor QUEZON. Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from the fifth district.

Señor QUEZON. Will the gentleman yield?

Señor OSIAS. Gladly.

Señor QUEZON. Is it the whole territory of Mindanao that is included in that Bacon bill, or only the part inhabited by the Mohammedans?

Señor OSIAS. I am glad the gentleman from the fifth district [Señor Quezon] asks me that question, because I failed to say that this measure seeks to create a separate government for the entire island of Mindanao, except Misamis, the island of Basilan, the Sulu Archipelago, including the islands known as the Jolo and Tawi-Tawi groups, the island of Palawan, the contiguous islets between Palawan and the Balabac Strait on the south, together with adjacent islets.

Señor QUEZON. Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from the fifth district.

Señor QUEZON. Will the gentleman yield?

Señor OSIAS. I yield, Mr. President.

Señor QUEZON. I should like to know if that means that the Province of Surigao, which is a province in Mindanao, is included within the territory for which this government is to be established.

Señor OSIAS. According to Title I, section 1, Mr. President, the only province excepted is Misamis. It is, therefore, reasonable to assume that Surigao would be included, inasmuch as it specifically states that a government is to be created for the entire Island of Mindanao, save Misamis alone.

Señor QUEZON. Another question. Would the gentleman care to inform the senate as to the number of Mohammedan Filipinos in the territory in question, as compared with the Christian Filipinos in the same region?

Señor OSIAS. I have in my possession, Mr. President, the data on the Christian and non-Christian population of the chief provinces or places affected on the basis of the figures of the 1918 census. Here they are: Agusan, 38,323 Christians and 6,035 non-Christians; Bukidnon, 25,299 Christians and 22,512 non-Christians; Cotabato, 21,391 Christians and 147,800 non-Christians; Davao, 68,979 Christians and 50,325 non-Christians; Lanao, 12,230 Christians and 82,716 non-Christians; Sulu, 28,072 Christians and 139,903 non-Christians; Surigao, 119,357 Christians and 2,665 non-Christians; Palawan, 53,444 Christians and 15,617 non-Christians; Zamboanga, 77,001 Christians and 70,990 non-Christians.

Therefore, the total number of Christians is 446,096 and the total number of non-Christians is 538,563. Considering the fact that not all of the non-Christians are Mohammedans the number of Christian Filipinos is probably greater than the number of Mohammedan Filipinos in the same territory to be converted into a "Moro Province."

As I was saying, Mr. President, this is a thoroughly un-American proposition, because from section 201 we find that the officials of the executive department shall consist of a governor, a secretary, an attorney, a treasurer, a director of education, and an engineer, who, together with the auditor, shall constitute the executive departments of the government created for the so-called Moro Province. These members of the executive department are appointed by the President of the United States with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

Now, I wish to call attention to the fact, having mentioned the officials that shall constitute the executive government, that the following functionaries, according to section 301 of this measure, shall constitute the legislative council: The governor, the secretary, the treasurer, the director of education, the engineer, and the attorney, each of whom has a right to vote in the legislative council. In addition to these six, it is provided that the President may also, in his discretion, appoint, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, not to exceed three additional members to such council with a right to vote or not, who may be citizens of the Philippines. We, thus, see that the people who constitute the executive department are the very same people who control the legislative council. Besides, Mr. President, in section 204 it is provided that the attorney for this Government created in the Moro Province shall have charge of the administration of justice. Here we have a concrete case. The attorney, having charge of the administration of justice, is one of the members of the executive department and is at the same time one of the important members of the legislative council.

It is alleged, Mr. President, that this measure was prompted by a desire to do greater justice to our brethren in the south, who, it is alleged, are denied participation in our existing government. The author in his explanatory note considers the representation of the southland in the Philippine Legislature as "a farce and mockery"; that they are "deliberately denied a share or participation in the government."

It should be borne in mind, Mr. President, that this is inaccurate on the very surface, because there is an elective representative, not only from Surigao but also from Palawan, territories which will have to be included within the jurisdiction of the government for the Moro Provinces. These Provinces besides have direct participation in the election of senators. In addition to that the rest of the territory to be included in this government has appointive senators and representatives, and if it is true, as alleged by the Congressman from New York, that their representation here in our Government is a farce and mockery, let it be made clear that this is not of our own making. It is in obedience to congressional enactment, and, therefore, the blame, if there be any, can not be laid at the doors of the Filipinos, but rather at the door of Congress, which enacted the measure which provided for the participation of the people in the south, which now is characterized as "a farce and mockery."

The Moros, for whom the author seems to show solicitous regard, are not really given participation in the government created, in accordance with this measure. There is nothing said in Title 2 of the appointment of a Mohammedan Filipino or a Christian Filipino in the executive branch of the government. In the administration of justice, no provision is made clearly specifying the appointment of the natives of that region, to have direction in this part or branch of the government and in the legislative council.

The most that can be done would be to have three who may be citizens of the Philippine Islands. They need not necessarily be Mohammedan Filipinos; any citizen of the Philippines can be appointed in the discretion of the President of the United States.

Besides, the President may appoint not more than three. Therefore, it is clear that he does not have to appoint three. He may appoint one, he may appoint two, he may not appoint any at all, but even if he would appoint three, they will still constitute a very small minority, since six members appointed by the President of the United States must be the controlling element in the entire government, because they have not only a share in the legislative work but they have the control of the executive work and the judicial work. The alleged Moro participation, therefore, is nil.

The author himself, in his explanatory note, gives himself away. He says among other things speaking of the people of that territory "that the administration of their affairs should be restored to a sane, humane, and forward-looking American administration." The intention of the author is very plain.

It is also clear, Mr. President, that in the appointment of officials in the executive branch of the Government of the selection of those, by the very provisions of section 201, would be highly discriminatory to the nationals, even to the Moros themselves, because it is provided that these members to constitute the executive department shall be citizens of the United States.

This measure also, Mr. President, from the standpoint of education, makes for poor administration. It does not make for forward-looking administration. Besides disregarding the Secretary of Public Instruction, it is provided that the Director of Education shall exercise general supervision over the entire school system of the Moro Province and, besides, he is required to present quarterly to the legislative council a requisition for the funds necessary for the maintenance of the schools of the Province.

In other words, you have an administration of education wherein every quarter the director of education is compelled to make his requisition, which will be far worse than the present administration, whereby the director of education for the entire archipelago now is only required to submit his request for a budget once for one entire year.

I will not dwell long on this phase of it because there is a more objectionable part. It is clear that this measure was prompted by a wrong assumption of a division of enmity which is more or less of a fetish; that this measure is violative of the fundamental principles upon which the American Government rests; that it concentrates powers; and that it does not make for good administration, both political and educational. But the worst feature, Mr. President, has not been mentioned. It not only nullifies powers already exercised by the Philippine Legislature but if this law is approved it would take away jurisdiction heretofore conferred upon the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands in cases arising in those places.

Section 402 seems clear. After section 401 providing for local courts in that Territory, it is provided that "review by the Supreme Court of the United States of final decisions of the court of last resort in the Province shall be governed as to right of review and procedure by the law applicable to the review of final decisions of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Government." Thus, it appears clear that this measure would render nugatory powers exercised by the supreme court, a supreme court the majority of whose members even now are Americans themselves.

The worst feature remains now for me to mention. The Filipino people have made know their opposition to all radical attempts at changing our existing land laws. The opposition was made clear on the part of the leaders of the Filipino participation in the government, members of the legislature, and the people at large when a proposition was made to the effect that as much as 200,000 hectares of land may be leased for 75 years for purposes of rubber cultivation.

If the Filipino people had objected and had registered their protest against those propositions, Mr. President, they have greater reason to protest against the provisions of this measure because it is expressly provided in section 501, subsection C, that the disposition of public lands will be practically in the hands of the legislative council without limit, for this provision declares as property of the United States all the property and rights within the Province acquired by the United States under cession from Spain, with certain minor exceptions.

We already are tied as legislators in enacting measures affecting our economic salvation. I say we are limited, because the Jones law, or our organic act, does not confer upon the Philippine Legislature the power of action in matters affecting our public lands, our mines, and our forests; and yet here we have in section 501 further curtailing the already limited powers in that respect by the Philippine Legislature by lodging in the hands of the proposed legislative council the practically absolute disposition of the public domain.

For the sake of clearness I would like to read the entire subsection C of section 501: "All the property and rights within the province acquired by the United States under cession from Spain, except such lands or other property as has been or shall be designated by the President for any public use of the United States, and except such as may have heretofore been sold or disposed of under acts of Congress or of the Philippine government, are hereby expressly declared to be and are hereby reserved as the property of the United States, and are placed under the control of the government of the province to be administered and disposed of by it; and all revenues derived from the sale, lease, or other disposition of such property and rights shall accrue to the said province for its use and benefit."

Mr. President, the author makes clear his purpose. Our first impression that this is an ingenious step to bring about the dismemberment of Philippine territory is now confirmed by a more careful perusal of the provisions of this measure. It is not surprising that an American Congressman himself, after becoming familiar with the provisions of this measure, was moved to remark that the Bacon bill is a measure "diabolical and outrageous, wholly unworthy of the United States."

Representative SCHAFER further adds a sentence which must move the heart of every Filipino. It reads: "It hurts my pride as an American citizen to admit, but it is a fact, that not only have we failed to keep our pledged word to the Filipino people, but there is an organized conspiracy being promoted by the great financial interests of the United States to confiscate their vast public lands and with it what little local self-government they have remaining in their hands after the ruthless 5-year administration of Governor General Wood." The charge is, perhaps, more than Filipinos had so far publicly stated, but we are informed by a respected Member of Congress of the existence of "an organized conspiracy being promoted by the great financial interests of the United States to confiscate our vast public lands" and to nullify or at least minimize the autonomous powers that have already been conferred.

The author of the bill, Mr. President, in his explanatory note defending his measure closed with the following words: "All who have given this matter careful thought agree that there is no doubt but that an independent government for the Moro Province would be entirely self-supporting." We are happy to read this admission. It should be borne in mind that that part of Philippine territory of the south is the least developed, economically speaking, of any part of the Philippine Archipelago. Now, if the author maintains that such a government to be established having jurisdiction over that southern territory can be entirely self-supporting, we can also claim with greater reason and perhaps better logic that the Philippine government, if made independent, would be entirely self-supporting, certainly more self-supporting than the Moro provincial government, which this measure seeks to establish.

I wish, in passing, to call attention to this testimony of Gouverneur Morris, one of America's foremost statesmen, who said: "At the time our Government was organized we were without funds, though not without resources." But the Philippine government, if made independent, would start with funds and with unlimited resources.

Señor QUEZON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from the fifth district.

Señor QUEZON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT. Will the gentleman from the second district yield for a question?

Señor OSIAS. With pleasure, Mr. President.

Señor QUEZON. How is this government going to be supported?

Señor OSIAS. One of the provisions is that found in section 501, subsection (c), whereby it is provided that "all revenues derived from the sale, lease, or other disposition of such property and rights shall accrue to the said Province for its use and benefit." In another section it is provided that part of the internal-revenue taxes collected, according to the explanatory note of the author of the bill, Mr. President, should be allocated to the treasury of the Moro Province. He said: "It is further suggested that a just proportion of the internal-revenue taxes collected in the United States on Philippine products and now returned by the United States to the insular treasury should be allocated to the treasury of the Moro Province." We have thus two sources which I have already mentioned. Besides, the legislative council is empowered to levy such taxes as are ordinarily levied by governments of a similar nature.

In conclusion, Mr. President, we ought to recall the historic fact that in 1920, or half a dozen years ago, an American President certified the fact that the Filipino people have already complied with the essential conditions precedent upon the granting of freedom and independence to the Philippine Islands. The message of President Wilson to the Congress of the United States in 1920 is meaningful and specific. He said: "Allow me to call attention to the fact that the Filipino people have succeeded in maintaining a stable government since the last act of Congress in their behalf and have thus fulfilled the conditions set by the Government as precedent to the granting of independence to the islands. I respectfully submit that this condition precedent having been fulfilled, it is now our liberty and our duty to keep our promise to the people of those islands by granting them the independence which they so honorably covet."

This recommendation was made in 1920. Not only has it not been fulfilled, not only have we failed to make a decisive forward step in our emancipatory struggles, but there are proofs aplenty to show that autonomous powers have been curtailed and that backward steps may be taken in the administration of affairs in the Philippine Islands, recommendation or promises of President Harding to the contrary notwithstanding.

The PRESIDENT. Will the gentleman from the Second District yield to the gentleman from the Fifth District?

Señor OSIAS. Most willingly, Mr. President.

Señor QUEZON. I should like to know if the Senator [Señor OSIAS] will agree with me when I say that we are spending every year for that part of the Philippines more than the income of the insular government from that region.

Señor OSIAS. It is true, Mr. President; and I should like to add that, in spite of the testimonies and statements of prophets of failure, like Worcester and others of his kind, saying that if the Filipinos had control over our non-Christian brethren they would be made to suffer and that they would be entirely neglected, it was at the time when we enjoyed greater autonomous powers that our non-Christian brethren enjoyed the best treatment from the government of the Philippine Islands.

Señor QUEZON. I should also like to ask, Mr. President, if the gentleman will not agree with me when I say that the Christian Filipinos inhabiting the whole island of Mindanao exceed in number the Mohammedan Filipinos in that island?

Señor OSIAS. The gentleman is correct, especially with the addition of Palawan and other parts which are now inhabited by Christian Filipinos.

I would like to ask the indulgence of this body, Mr. President, by requesting to be placed on record the policy followed by the Philippine government in the work with our non-Christian brethren, which is embodied in the law creating a bureau especially to look after the interests of our non-Christian population, because this law not only defines the purpose of the bureau from the standpoint of the Filipino people, but also the meaning of the policy of the attraction and unification. The law says: "It shall be the duty of the Bureau of Non-Christians to continue the work for advancement and liberty in favor of the region inhabited by non-Christian Filipinos, and foster by all adequate means and in a systematic, rapid, and complete manner, the moral, material, economic, social, and political development of those regions, always having in view the aim of rendering permanent the mutual intelligence between and keep complete fusion of the Christian and non-Christian elements populating the provinces of the archipelago."

The approval of a measure, like the subject of our discussion, would be a direct reversal of this policy; it would promote division, and would weaken the union of the Filipino population. (Diario de Sessiones, vol. 1, No. 30, pp. 320–324.)

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—SYSTEM OF DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS BY THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND BY THE STATE OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, it has been frequently stated in Congress that a dozen or more States pay into the Federal Treasury enormous sums which in turn are spent in States whose contribution to the National Treasury is negligible. While this is true, the spokesmen overlook a fundamental principle of taxation. That is, that wealth is taxed where wealth is found. The situation, demonstrable as it may be by analysis of Treasury reports, has its analogy within the State governments where the same condition obtains.

The cities wherein are located the great financial and industrial institutions contribute lavishly to the coffers of the State while the smaller suburban and rural communities pay by comparison but a pittance, illustrating that wealth is taxed where wealth is found. In the United States we have a federation of States. In Connecticut we have a federation of towns.

In the following excerpts from the reports of the State of Connecticut are included items of tax by which the relation of payments and receipts of the individual cities and towns can be reflected. There are certain other transactions between the local and State governments but the return to the town in each instance is proportioned to the amount paid to the State; in other words, they cancel each other and do not alter the standing of the communities as fixed by State and military tax payments and the return for highways and educational grants.

These transactions, from which are derived a large portion of the State funds, include the tax of shares of stock of banks, trust and insurance companies on estates, and licenses.

The $8,259,441.45, more or less, received by Connecticut for automobile andd rivers' licenses, which in turn is spent on the highways of the State, is not classified as to towns and cities.

The civil list account of the State, which in 1931 amounted to $40,931,681.24, includes such major items as: $4,320,418.44 gasoline tax, $2,110,717.49 highway-department receipts, $4,827,397.37 inheritance tax; $1,033,990.64 insurance-commissioner receipts, $659,366.72 tax on mutual life-insurance companies, $3,534,787.44 net income tax from corporations, $3,933,319.76 tax on public-service corporations, $1,758,361.87 tax on savings deposits, $1,061,404.57 State agencies and institutions, $602,607.35 State board of education, $1,962,416 franchise tax on stock-insurance companies, $606,206 nonresident stock tax.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. CULLEN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if it is his purpose to complete the bill to-morrow?

Mr. COLLINS. We wish to go as far toward the passage of the bill as is possible. I do not know whether we will be able to complete it or not.

Mr. CULLEN. I want to ask the gentleman if there will be any roll call to-morrow on the bill?

Mr. COLLINS. I am not able to answer the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. There will probably be roll calls on the bill at some time.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, the committee of which I am a member has some very important hearings to-morrow, and I can not be in two places at the same time. I object.

EXPOSITION IN PARIS IN 1931 (S. DOC. NO. 94)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I have been asked to request unanimous consent to take up at this time Senate Resolution 213, a resolution further increasing the limit of expenditures in the matter of the Heflin-Bankhead senatorial contest from the State of Alabama. The resolution was introduced, referred to the appropriate committee, reported with an amendment, and I understand that as amended the resolution is agreeable to both contestant and contestee. Wherefore I am making this request.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I yield.

Mr. KING. Has the matter been brought to the attention of the full committee? I am the ranking minority member of the committee, and I never heard of it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. HASTINGS] will make answer to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, is this going to lead to debate?

Mr. KING. It will.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not think it will; or, rather, I had hoped it would not.

Mr. SMOOT. If it is going to lead to debate, I must object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I hope that when consideration of the resolution is again suggested there will not be any objection or any prolonged debate. There are certain expenditures that have been incurred. The parties to the contest have expressed satisfaction with the resolution as it was and is amended. Of course, if there is objection, the matter will have to rest for further consideration.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 382) making an additional appropriation for printing and binding for Congress for the fiscal year 1932 was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

IMPORTATIONS OF WOOD PULP—REVISED DATA

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the acting chairman of the United States Tariff Commission relative to its recent report on wood pulp and pulpwood (presenting tables showing the production during the three years 1929, 1930, and 1931 of a large number of domestic pulp mills) submitting additional data on pulp mills, revising and correcting the figures previously presented, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. SHORTRIDGE presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from Margaret O'Reilly, president of the Hibernian organization, and Mrs. Charles O'Donnell Lee, jr., president of the Altar Society of the Old Santa Barbara Mission, both of Santa Barbara, Calif., remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 3907) to amend section 211 of the Criminal Code, as amended (relating to certain nonmailable matter), especially with reference to the dissemination of birth-control information, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TYDINGS presented a resolution adopted by Wicomico Post, No. 64, American Legion, of Salisbury, Md., favoring elimination of the interest rate on veterans' adjusted-service certificates, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Snow Hill-Worcester Chamber of Commerce, at Snow Hill, Md., favoring the prompt balancing of the Budget and retrenchment in governmental expenditures, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of the State of Maryland, remonstrating against reductions in the compensation of Federal employees or adoption of the so-called furlough plan in the Federal service, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of the State of Maryland, remonstrating against reductions in the compensation of Federal employees, the dismissal of certain married persons in the Government service, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BARBOUR presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the New Jersey Insurance Co., at New York City, N. Y., favoring the repeal of the recapture clause of the transportation act of 1920, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Republican Veterans' Association of New Jersey, Trenton, N. J., favoring the immediate repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution and the Volstead Act, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of the State of New Jersey, being members and friends of the South Jersey Radio Association, remonstrating against the passage of legislation to tax amateur radio stations and operators (known as House bill 7716), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Lions Club of Trenton and the Kiwanis Club of Hackensack, both in the State of New Jersey, favoring the balancing of the Budget and retrenchment in governmental expenditures, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JONES presented a resolution adopted by John Wannebo Camp, No. 9, United Spanish War Veterans, of Everett, Wash., favoring the passage of legislation to provide for the stabilization of values of imports from countries changing their monetary standards, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of members of the Seattle Yacht Club, of Seatle, Wash., remonstrating against the imposition of a 10 per cent tax on motor boats and yachts, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Tacoma Council, No. 12, Junior Order of United American Mechanics, of Tacoma, Wash., indorsing the so-called Moore bill, restricting the immigration of aliens, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented the petition of the Daughters of the American Revolution of the State of Washington, praying for the passage of legislation making it a crime to advocate or promote the overthrow or destruction of the Government of the United States by force or violence and also certain restrictive immigration measures, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KEAN presented a statement from Albert I. Mehrbach, of East Orange, N. J., relative to the so-called Mehrbach plan for the protection of bank depositors, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, memorializing Congress to provide for the construction of a ship canal across the State of New Jersey from Raritan Bay to the Delaware River, at a point near the head of navigation, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. (See resolution printed in full when presented to-day by Mr. BARBOUR.)

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented papers in the nature of petitions from 1,025 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the modification of the Volstead Act and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented papers in the nature of memorials from 110 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the modification of the Volstead Act or repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of 550 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the adoption of an orderly tax program, retrenchment in governmental expenditures, and the defeat of the cash-bonus proposal, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented papers in the nature of petitions from 190 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the balancing of the Budget, the defeat of the cash-bonus proposal, the stopping of "all raids on the Treasury," retrenchment in governmental expenditures, but the preservation of the national defense, the enactment of fair sales and stamp taxes, amendment of the Volstead Act, and the taxation of light wine and beer, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RESTAURANT IN NEW FEDERAL BUILDING AT BOSTON, MASS.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I present a letter in the nature of a memorial, signed by sundry citizens and firms, being restauranteurs of Boston, Mass., remonstrating against the appropriation of Government funds for the purpose of installing or operating a restaurant or eating place for employees of the Post Office Department in the new Federal building at Boston, Mass., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, the letter in the nature of a memorial was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures, as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., May 9, 1932.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
Chairman Senate Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned restauranteurs of Boston, are anxious to enlist your aid in presenting a vigorous and immediate protest against the appropriation of Government funds for the purpose of installing or operating an eating place for employees of the Post Office Department in the Boston, Mass., new Federal building. The following points are submitted for your consideration:

1. The Federal building is in the heart of the city, not isolated, and it is a known fact that the restaurant facilities in the immediate vicinity of the proposed building are adequate to meet all existing and future needs.

2. The operation of restaurants by employees' committees in Government buildings on a rent-free basis constitutes unfair competition to a legitimate industry.

3. In many cities such unfair competition has been one of the factors causing the heavy business mortality in the restaurant industry, the seventh among retail trades.

4. This mortality is the subject of study by the United States Department of Commerce in view of eliminating the financial losses it brings about.

5. The operation of restaurants in Government buildings gives no assurance of better food, service, or surroundings than may be had in many near-by eating places, but will add materially to the tremendous deficit under which the Post Office Department is now operating.

Thanking you for the consideration which we feel confident will be given by you in this matter, we remain,

Very sincerely.

SHIP CANAL ACROSS NEW JERSEY

Mr. BARBOUR presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY.

Joint Resolution No. 4, Laws of 1932, memorializing the Congress of the United States to construct a ship canal across the State of New Jersey from Raritan Bay to the Delaware River, at a point near the head of navigation

Whereas an inland waterways system has been provided along the entire Atlantic coast with the exception of the short distance through the State of New Jersey; and

Whereas the construction of a ship canal through the State of New Jersey will complete said inland waterways system; and

Whereas the State of New Jersey has heretofore appropriated considerable money for the acquisition of the right of way for such canal, and has from year to year reappropriated said moneys; and

Whereas the State of New Jersey has been and still is ready and willing to furnish the right of way for such canal in accordance with representations heretofore made to the Federal Government: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey:

1. That the Congress of the United States is hereby memorialized and requested to appropriate a sufficient sum of money to construct a ship canal across the State of New Jersey from Raritan Bay to the Delaware River, at a point near the head of navigation, upon a right of way to be furnished by this State: Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Member in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States from the State of New Jersey.

3. This joint resolution shall take effect immediately.

Approved May 2, 1932.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Thomas A. Mathias, secretary of state of the State of New Jersey, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a joint resolution passed by the legislature of this State and approved by the governor the 2d day of May, A. D. 1932, as taken from and compared with the original now on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal at Trenton, this 13th day of May, 1932.

[SEAL.] THOMAS A. MATHIAS,
Secretary of State.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. VANDENBERG, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4554) authorizing the Fort Hancock-Porvenir Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Rio Grande at Fort Hancock, Tex., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 690) thereon.

Mr. AUSTIN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 154) to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 691) thereon.

Mr. FRAZIER, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 1197) to liquidate and refinance agricultural indebtedness and to encourage and promote agriculture, commerce, and industry by establishing an efficient credit system, through which the unjust and unequal burdens placed upon agriculture during the period of price fixing and deflation may be lightened, by providing for the liquidation and refinancing of farm mortgages and farm indebtedness at a reduced rate of interest through the Federal farm loan system, the Federal reserve banking system, and the postal-savings depository system, and creating a board of agriculture to supervise the same, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 692) thereon.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE APPROPRIATION

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 382) making an additional appropriation for printing and binding for Congress for the fiscal year 1932 passed the House, came to the Senate, and was referred to and considered by the Appropriations Committee. It provides an immediate appropriation of $500,000 for the Government Printing Office. This amount was included in the legislative appropriation bill to be made immediately available. That bill, as we know, is now before the committee and we are considering very carefully the legislative part of it. The bill will not pass for some little time yet. It is extremely important that this $500,000 should be made available. The Public Printer is now taking money from here and there and using it in anticipation of getting this appropriation. A letter sent by the Public Printer to the Appropriations Committee of the House calls attention to the situation, and he closes the letter by saying:

> I regret to state that unless measures are taken at once to relieve this imperative need I will be compelled to discontinue all congressional printing, including the RECORD, and this not later than Monday, May 16, 1932. This would mean our entire congressional force would have to be laid off, as departmental printing is insufficient to keep it employed.

From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read at length, ordered to a third reading, read the third time by title, and passed, as follows:

> Resolved, etc., That the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for printing and binding for Congress, including the same objects and under the same conditions specified under the appropriation "Public printing and binding, Government Printing Office, 1932," contained in the legislative appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

REPORTS OF THE NAVAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the nomination of Capt. John W. Greenslade to be a rear admiral in the Navy from the 1st day of May, 1932, and also the nomination of sundry officers in the Navy and the Marine Corps, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 4663) granting a pension to Matt Henson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TYDINGS:

A bill (S. 4664) granting a pension to Max Shar (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 4665) granting a pension to Adah C. Seed (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LOGAN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 158) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the terms of President and Vice President and Members of the House of Representatives; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REVENUE AND TAXATION—AMENDMENTS

Mr. COPELAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10236, the revenue and taxation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

> On page 48, after line 19, insert a new subsection, as follows:
> "(c) In any case in which the statute of limitations, as to credits and refunds, in this act or prior revenue acts has not run against a husband and wife, and until such statute shall have run against them, either or both may file under this act and under such prior acts an amended joint return to take the place of the individual returns filed by them or amended separate returns to take the place of the joint return filed by them, if the change will cause a combined lesser tax than the joint return or individual returns originally filed."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have printed and lie on the table a proposed amendment to the pending revenue bill, House bill 10236, providing for the excess-profits tax which we had during the wartime.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Texas will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 3584. An act to require all insurance corporations formed under the provisions of Chapter XVIII of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia to maintain their principal offices and places of business within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

S. 4193. An act to authorize the issuance of bonds by the St. Thomas Harbor Board, Virgin Islands, for the acquisition or construction of a graving or dry dock;

S. J. Res. 36. Joint resolution to change the name of the island of "Porto Rico" to "Puerto Rico"; and

H. J. Res. 382. Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for printing and binding for Congress for the fiscal year 1932.

HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF MORSE SIMPLIFIED TELEGRAPH CODE

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it was a hundred years ago to-day that Samuel F. B. Morse announced the use of the simplified telegraph code. It seems a pity that we must have reminders of these great anniversaries. Recently I had a letter from the granddaughter of Mr. Morse, Miss Leila Livingston Morse, stating:

> It was 100 years ago in Paris, after seeing the early efforts of the French telegraphs (without electricity), that there came to him instantaneously the use of the simplified code transmitted by electricity. After 12 years of work to perfect an instrument and heroic effort to get Congress to make an appropriation for an experimental line, the first message was sent, in 1844, from Washington. This year marks the one hundredth commemoration of his inspiration, to which Fenimore Cooper (then living in Paris) testified in some of his works. There was a joint session of the Senate and House on the occasion of my grandfather's funeral in 1872.

It seems that the first message was sent from a room in New York University in Washington Square and was distinctly heard over 10 miles of wire. The message was, "Attention, the universe; by kingdoms, right wheel."

Then a later message of longer reach, "What hath God wrought?" was sent from what was then the Supreme Court room in the Capitol, received in Baltimore, and immediately answered.

Mr. President, it seems fitting that at least this brief reference should be made to this remarkable discovery, and I ask that, as a part of my remarks, an editorial in this morning's New York Times, entitled "Morse the Intelligencer," be printed with my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, May 14, 1932]

MORSE THE INTELLIGENCER

The first clear prophecy of the alphabet known as the Morse code and of the instrument for its use is to be found in a statement which Samuel F. B. Morse made aboard the packet ship Sully on his way home from Europe in 1832:

"If the presence of electricity can be made visible in any part of the circuit, I see no reason why intelligence may not be transmitted by electricity."

Though he was among the first painters of his time and the first president of the Academy of Design, from that day he was in the way of establishing a name for himself in another field. He became in time the "intelligencer" of the world.

The first message, sent from a room in New York University in Washington Square and distinctly heard over 10 miles of wire—"Attention, the universe; by kingdoms, right wheel"—had a prophetic suggestion of the future reach of the clicking messages borne by electricity along the wires of which there are now some six or seven millions of miles—and many of them still using the means of communication invented by the son of Jedediah Morse, the early American geographer. The first message of longer reach, "What hath God wrought?" sent from what was then the Supreme Court room in the Capitol, received in Baltimore, and immediately answered, will be especially remembered by the ceremonies in the same room (now the library on the second floor of the Capitol) to be held this afternoon, beginning with a telegram from the President of the United States and the use of the same instrument that Morse used, and followed by a radio program in which European countries, from England to Italy, will take part.

It is not contended that Morse discovered the principle of electromagnetic transmission, but he was the first to devise the alphabet by which electricity could transmit in that universal language the words of men of divers tongues, and the first to construct the device for their utterance. In a very real sense his lines have gone throughout the earth, and there is no language nor speech in which the voice of his instrument is not heard—a Pentecostal code wherein each man can know his neighbor's thought though separated by half the globe.

Word comes by his tele-speech that the ruins of the supposed Tower of Babel have been unearthed in Mesopotamia. Confusion of tongues still prevails in the earth, but there is promise of a "whole earth of one language and of one speech" again through the perfected and extended means of communicating intelligence—and Morse is one of its prophets. The nations of the earth have wheeled right or left at the command of peoples possessed of the far-speaking instruments with which in train of his telegraph democracies have been "implemented."

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, somewhat in keeping with what the Senator from New York has just said, I want to call attention to the marvelous advance in the use of electricity for transmitting the human voice by reference to an article in the New York Times of this morning, which explains how, at the opening of a building last night on Pine Street, 60 Wall Tower, a man's voice was carried on moonbeams, and how moonbeams were used not only to transmit his voice but were used to light the electric lights on the tower of the building. This was done by a photo-electric cell moonbeam condenser which worked as perfectly as any wire connection that could be devised. I only mention that by way of bearing out the remarks of the Senator from New York as to how far we have advanced in the use of electricity in transmitting the human voice.

PROTECTION OF LABOR BY TARIFF ON COPPER

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the Salt Lake Tribune of May 9, 1932, relative to the imposition of a tariff on copper and thereby protecting labor.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROTECTING LABOR

In the popular mind of the West, particularly that part of it which depends in some measure upon copper production for sustenance, there will be no doubt but what the Senate Finance Committee acts wisely in restoring the projected tariffs on copper. Long before this many American families have been visibly impressed with the vital part that copper production plays in daily existence.

They have seen their means of livelihood dissipated by an overabundance of the red metal and attendant declining prices. Those remaining in the industry on a part-time basis know that they eke out an existence in a large measure by the sufferance and the fortitude of the industry. Their only hope, under existing conditions, is to be found in the remedy which it is now proposed to apply—a tariff, which will afford them a measure of protection against foreign competition.

There was a time when the industry itself needed this protection to endure, but in the past score of years it has been able to more than meet the competition of foreign production. Its position now, however, is not so promising. The tenure of those dependent upon this activity for a livelihood is less secure, if it is not altogether uncertain.

At this time the need of a copper tariff is felt keenly by those dependent upon the industry for the support of their families. In the Western States, particularly, a considerable number of people are directly engaged in the process of copper production. Their misfortunes are reflected to other lines of business and industrial endeavor.

Without some protection against heavy importations and without some encouragement to American production, their economic place in the life of the West is threatened with complete dissipation. The copper tariff seeks to preserve in some measure their accustomed place in the industrial life of the West. Without this protection they are faced with the necessity of finding new occupations at a time when every field of endeavor is seriously disturbed by its own surpluses. The proposed tariff is not to be confused with endeavors to foster infant enterprises. Rather it is a well-reasoned effort to protect labor against industrial decay, preserving so far as possible the labor fabric of a gigantic industry.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, are we about to have a vote taken on the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan. The Chair will state, however, that that amendment is divisible, if any Senator wishes to have it divided.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas and nays are demanded. Is the demand sufficiently seconded?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the roll about to be called on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have not as yet been ordered. Is the demand seconded? A sufficient number having seconded the demand for the yeas and nays, they are now ordered.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I shall not delay the Senate for any extended speech, but I want to give voice to my views regarding the pending amendment and what its adoption or rejection would mean in connection with the bill now before us, both as to raising revenue and as to its effect upon the people of this country.

Everybody agrees that we must raise revenue by new taxes. The whole question is, Who is to pay these new taxes? We are not going to get them from the 8,000,000 unemployed in this country; we are not going to get them from the farmers, who have been losing their homes and farms, who have been receiving 30 cents a bushel for their wheat, 3 cents a pound for their hogs, 50 cents apiece for their sheep, 10 cents a pound for their wool, and 5 cents a pound for their cotton. We are not going to get them from the people who have had swept away their life savings in 4,000 banks which have closed their doors since the panic began. The whole question is, From whom will we secure these taxes?

There are two sources from which we can collect them. One is from the people who are still working on part time, from the small business men who are struggling to keep out of bankruptcy, and from those who still have small savings that have not been entirely exhausted; or we can take them from the people who are still receiving large incomes and who have large accumulations of wealth which can be reached by inheritance taxes.

I do not want by anything I may say to seem to take sides or to array classes one against another, but I do not see how it is possible for any man to close his eyes to the fact that a large part of this burden of more than a billion dollars in new taxes can better be paid by those who still receive substantial incomes, and especially by those few who are still receiving enormous incomes, than it can be borne by the millions of common men who are still keeping their heads above water but are on the edge of bankruptcy or on the verge of losing their jobs or their business.

In last night's Washington News there was an editorial to the effect that 31 per cent of the income of our people is being paid each year in the form of taxes, Federal, State, and local. The editorial pointed out that those who do not have property upon which to pay taxes pay their share of the taxes in the added cost of food, clothing, rent, and other necessities of life. If we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, we shall be able to avoid adding to the taxes on the necessities of life and on the things used in new production throughout the country. If we do not adopt such taxes, then we must raise considerably more revenue, amounting to between $200,000,000 and $300,000,000, by taxes upon business of various kinds that have to do directly with the daily life of our people.

I do not know in any detail how those who have big fortunes from which they will secure during the coming year immense incomes accumulated them, but I do know that some of them were acquired by indefensible methods upon the stock exchanges of this country.

I want to call attention to what happened in connection with the boosting of the prices of stocks of the great industrial and business organizations of this country and what has happened since the panic began. If during the period of boom prices on the stock exchange any citizen bought 1 share of each of the 14 leading industrial stocks on the New York exchanges which I shall mention, he would have paid $2,530 for them. If he sold them yesterday at the prices then prevailing, he would have received a very small percentage of that amount; in fact, he would have received only $165. Let me give the Senate some of the figures.

The United States Steel Co. stock in July, 1929, was selling at $261.75 a share; yesterday it sold at $27.25;

New York Central Railway stock sold in 1929 at $256.50 a share; yesterday it sold at $11;

The stock of the American Machine & Foundry Co. sold in 1929 was $279.75; yesterday at sold at $12.75;

The stock of the Westinghouse Electric Co. in 1929 sold at $292.50 a share, while yesterday it sold at $23.25;

The stock of the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Co. sold in July, 1929, at $467 a share; yesterday it sold at $21;

The stock of the General Motors Corporation sold in 1929 at $91.75 a share; yesterday it sold at $10.25;

The stock of the United Aircraft Corporation in 1929 sold at $162; yesterday it sold at $7.25;

The stock of the Radio Corporation in 1929 sold at $114.75 a share; yesterday it sold at $3.75;

The stock of the Trans-America Corporation in July, 1929, sold at $67.25 a share; yesterday it sold at $3;

The stock of the Anaconda Copper Co. in 1929 sold for $140 a share, and yesterday it sold for $5;

The stock of the Goodrich Rubber Co. in 1929 sold for $105.75 a share, while yesterday it sold for $3.50 a share;

The stock of the Standard Oil Co. of California in 1929 sold for $81.75 a share, while yesterday it sold for $19 a share;

The stock of the International Telephone & Telegraph Co. in 1929 sold for $109 a share, while yesterday it sold for $5; and

The stock of the General Electric Corporation in 1929 sold for $101 a share, while yesterday it sold for $13.50 a share.

The list of these shares, their present values, and the percentages are as follows:

If you bought one share of each of following stock-market leaders in July, 1929, it would—

	Cost you	Recent value, May 13	Percentage of former value
United States Steel Co	$261.75	$27.25	10.4
New York Central R. R	256.50	11.00	4.3
American Machine & Foundry	279.75	12.75	4.2
Westinghouse Electric Mfg. Co	292.50	23.25	7.9
J. I. Case Threshing Machine	467.00	21.00	4.5
General Motors Corporation	91.75	10.25	11.1
United Aircraft Corporation	162.00	7.25	4.4
Radio Corporation of America	114.75	3.75	3.2
Trans-America Corporation	67.25	3.00	4.4
Anaconda Copper & Smelting	140.00	5.00	3.5
Goodrich Rubber Co	105.75	3.50	3.3
Standard Oil of California	81.75	19.00	23.2
International Telephone & Telegraph Co	109.00	5.00	4.6
General Electric Co	101.00	13.50	13.3
1 share of each	2,530.75	165.50	6.5

Some of those now possessing vast fortunes accumulated them by boosting on the stock market the price of the stocks of such corporations as I have mentioned; they accumulated them by the issuance of watered stock, by the issuance of split stock, by the issuance of stock dividends. They sold the stock thus acquired at the boom prices and made millions of dollars. I know that many of them have since lost their money in speculation, but I call attention to the fortunes derived from this source which to-day produce large incomes to citizens of the country in considering which in the levying of taxes at a time like this nobody should be tender.

Then there is another source of fortunes, namely, the great chain business of this country. The great commercial organizations that have spread themselves all over the land and pick a few pennies out of the pockets of the millions of common citizens every day of the year for the necessities of life in which they are dealing have built up immense fortunes for some individuals. That has been true of various other activities. I shall not enlarge upon the suggestion, but I am calling attention to it to show that the people who secured these vast sums of money in the days of prosperity and have them now in sufficient amount to enable them to receive big incomes will not be unjustly treated if we place upon them income taxes at the war rates.

The opponents of this proposal, as I have listened to them and as I have read their arguments, continually bring forth the claim that it will handicap business and drive money into tax-exempt securities. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] yesterday answered that better than I can. I just want to say that if the men with large amounts of money put their money into tax-exempt securities somebody must sell those securities; so the same amount of money is still free for business purposes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. As a matter of fact—I asked the question yesterday, but I do not think the Senator was in the Chamber at the time—in the Senator's opinion, could anything better be done to-day than to put some money into municipal and State securities, so that we could prosecute public works? Not only is the money spent to employ labor, but after the utility is constructed it is for the common use and benefit of everybody.

Mr. DILL. Yes; I think that is true.

I want to call attention further to the fact that if some of these men with so many millions are induced not to invest their money in these great, nation-wide chain organizations, the independent business men of America will have a little better chance. The growth of individualism and capitalism in this country has gone to such an extent that it will be well if it is curbed somehow. I do not argue for high income-tax rates for the purpose of distributing wealth or for the purpose of curbing big business. I argue for it as a necessity; but if, as an incident of carrying out a policy that is just and fair, we should break down this growing tendency to extend the chain principle to every activity of American business, we will have done a real service to the American people.

The President this morning, in a statement published in the newspapers, says that we must use war methods to bring back prosperity. Senators, we must do more than that. We must use war methods to save what little business activity there is left in this country.

In the time of war we asked those with great fortunes to make tremendous sacrifices for war; and they did so willingly, I think. They should be willing to make great sacrifices now; and if they are not willing, then by law we should compel them to make those sacrifices. The sacrifices in time of war, we said, were for the purpose of making democracy safe throughout the world. The sacrifices to-day, in my judgment, will be made to maintain democracy in this great Republic.

Congress must levy these big taxes to provide money to run this Government, or it must levy the taxes upon the millions of common men and women who are still struggling to make enough money to keep themselves from the bread lines and from asking help from charity organizations.

I remind you that these high taxes upon the big incomes will not be socialism. They will not be communism. They will not be confiscation. They will not even be a limitation on great fortunes. They will simply be a method of farsighted legislation by which a great democracy defends itself and insures its own continuation.

When we place a larger share of the burdens of government in these hard times on the rich and the powerful, we shall prove that our democracy can be made to function satisfactorily in periods of great emergency such as this. Such legislation is both fair and wise. It is simple justice. Those who accumulated these vast fortunes in days of prosperity took more than their fair share of the profits of production. It is only fair that they should pay a large part of the expenses of government in these days of adversity.

Even if these high taxes were not justified on this ground, the wealthy and the powerful can well afford to pay them as a small premium to insure the continuation of democracy, and the system of individualism and capitalism of which they are such ardent champions. Unless we do continue this system of democracy, this system of individualism, then the opportunities for which we hear so much pleading for the youth of the world, and particularly of America, will soon be lost.

Those with great fortunes and big incomes have got more out of democracy, they have got more out of individual opportunity, they have got more out of capitalism than any other of our population. If the opportunities which democracy affords our people are taken away, what will be the rewards for brains and enterprise then? If the security which democracy gives to their fortunes, which democracy guarantees to them is taken away, how will they protect those fortunes in the future?

I say to those who talk about this being confiscation that instead it is a wise policy which says to the masses of the people of America that in these times of stress and travail we propose to make those who have accumulated vast wealth, and those who, because of that accumulation, are still able to make vast incomes, pay the major part of the increases in taxes necessary to maintain the Government.

Unless we are able to do that, unless we are willing to do that, we have no right to go to the common citizens of this country and say, "You pay more on your cost of living. You pay more on your postage stamps. You pay more on the things that you use and wear," because we will not have been fair with them. We will not have been just with them in imposing the burdens of government.

Without any spirit of threat, without any spirit of prophecy, I want to call attention to the fact that at a time like this a democracy that does not place these heavy burdens first upon those who are best able to bear them does not justify the claims of those who argue that equal opportunity shall remain in America.

I have long believed, and I believe now, that the fairest hope and proudest boast of our people is the open door of opportunity before the children of America; and I am not very much worried about discouraging those who have millions, and want to make millions more, as compared with giving the millions of common citizens of the country a chance to get back on their feet, a chance to make a livelihood, a chance to care for their families properly without being compelled to go into the breadlines or accept the dole from charity organizations in this country. I do not care whether we use the particular rates which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] proposes or whether we use the rates which will be proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]; the point I make is that since we must increase taxes at a time when our people are enduring greater privation than they have endured in a generation—aye, in a century, I think—we should place the burden first upon the backs of those who can best carry it.

I come from the great State of Washington, in the far-northwestern part of the country. I speak of the conditions in the city of Seattle, because I know more about it than I do about most other cities. We have a vast army of unemployed in that city. They have formed an unemployed organization there. That unemployed organization to-day controls more than 50,000 of the 150,000 votes in that city. That organization has been demanding, and I am glad to say receiving free seed and free tools from the officials of the city of Seattle, that its members may plant a crop and produce food during the coming summer. They are demanding that the Legislature of the State of Washington shall meet and appropriate $3,000,000 for public works to give them employment. They are demanding that an unemployment-insurance system shall be established there to provide a ten or twenty dollar a month payment to the unemployed, one-third of it to be paid by the State, one-half by the employees, and one-sixth by the working people themselves.

I am not here to argue for these propositions. I am calling attention to the fact that when one-third of the voting population of the great city of Seattle is in a position to make these demands and does make them, as a legal proposition, it is high time to begin to think of what we are going to do, not only for them but for those who are on the border line between those in class of the 50,000 now unemployed there and those in the class of the 100,000 who are not unemployed or are not yet in need.

I think those who are wealthy, and those who have great incomes, will profit most by placing on their own shoulders these burdens, rather than trying to place them on the class of people who are just between those who are now unemployed and in need of charity and the wealthy and powerful who constitute but a few. I urge upon the Senate to consider what it means when we place upon the backs of the common people an additional burden in the form of taxes, and make the increases in taxes on big incomes only slight and inconsequential in comparison.

Those opposed to these rates tell us that the man who makes a million dollars under these rates will have to pay $700,000 of it in the form of taxes. They do not remind us that he will have $300,000 left. Certainly it is not confiscation if we leave to a man $300,000 a year in times like these, when millions of our people can not secure work, when millions of our people, as honest and as law-abiding and as anxious to make a livelihood for their families as you and I can be, are unable to secure the opportunity to do so. Certainly we are leaving the man with a million-dollar income all that he ought to have in comparison.

I would not have it understood that I am in favor of these high rates as a permanent policy. I would not have it understood that I argue for them as a just method of taxation in ordinary times. I do want it understood, however, that when the alternative is the imposition of taxes that will burden the masses of the people of America who are on the border line between charity and just making their own way, I choose to place the tax upon the comparatively few people who still have such vast incomes that these high rates will hit rather than upon those who are already overburdened with taxes and the cost of living.

Personally I confidently believe that most of the wealthy will accept such rates in a spirit of sacrifice and of patriotic assistance to the Nation in a time like this rather than in a spirit of punishment or limitation of fortunes or distribution of wealth. I come back again and say: What will it profit us if we maintain the principle that we will not interfere with those men who make a million dollars having four or five hundred thousand dollars of it left and drive millions more of our people to beggary in a time like this? What will it profit us if a few men can still carry on their business with the hope that they will have a million dollars clear next year because the taxes will not be so high as to interfere, while millions more of our people are driven to beggary by the added taxes we place upon them, and, worst of all, have the feeling that they are not being given a square deal by their Government in these times of stress?

I know Senators are thinking in terms of the great theory of individualism—that in the United States a man may make what he desires and keep most of it. I recognize that many Senators here are still acting in accordance with the old ideas and the old principles. But I want to remind Senators of something. There is a younger generation growing up in the United States. It is the best-educated crowd of boys and girls the world ever saw. They are better fitted to take on the duties and opportunities of American citizenship than any young people the world has ever known; and I say unto you that that generation will not consent to beg for a living. They will demand that this Nation shall give them a fair opportunity, and they will see to it that the laws of this land are written so that they will have a fair opportunity. They will see to it that our Constitution is amended, if necessary; and I speak of their ability to do that in a peaceful way, not by revolution but by the peaceful methods of our legislative procedure. I maintain that they will do that; and that those who now plead here for this idea of individualism, for this idea of not interfering with a man's right to make a million dollars clear, without great burden, will find themselves having but accelerated a movement which may result in far more drastic changes in our basic constitutional provisions than this temporarily high tax schedule will be. This tax proposes only a temporary method of taking a large percentage of the income of those who make vast amounts of money in times like these for the purpose of paying the expenses of Government. I earnestly hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, it is with some timidity that I raise my voice in this body, but I have no desire to escape responsibility by hiding behind a screen of my brief service here.

I shall support the principle of the amendment offered by the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

Ability to pay is the most equitable yardstick of taxation. If we reinstate the income-tax rates of the 1918 revenue act, we shall impose no hardship; for if there be no net income, there will be no payment, and certainly those who enjoy net incomes in a period such as this can not with justice complain of a nonconfiscatory contribution to the support of the Government.

As the Senator from Michigan has said so well, the cost of living now is so far below that of 1918 that the same rate of taxation, taken from net income, means a lighter burden to-day than in the war period, because the purchasing power of the balance left in the hands of the taxpayer is so far greater now.

It is necessary for the welfare of the Nation and its people that we approximately balance the Federal Budget, but in so doing we should adjust the burdens of citizenship fairly.

My observation is that unless we are to go far afield in tapping new or additional sources of revenue we shall be forced to depend upon either materially higher income-tax rates or a general sales tax. With the sales-tax proposal I find myself in strong disagreement. I take issue with the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. SMOOT] in his assertion that a tax upon outgo is a fair measure of ability to pay. A tax upon consumption operates inequitably and applies its burdens without consideration of income.

We are at war with economic depression. Let us return to war-time rates of taxation upon those sufficiently fortunate to have net incomes and turn our faces against tariff proposals, sales taxes, and nuisance taxes as far as possible. I hope for the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I understand the Senator from Michigan wants to make a brief statement, and I yield to him.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, yesterday I was asked to put into the RECORD a number of tables and I was not quite ready with them then. I now want to place in the RECORD several tables, which I shall designate and then send to the desk.

Table 1 shows by classes the total normal and surtaxes which would be paid under the present law, under the provisions of the bill as it passed the House, under the provisions of the bill as proposed by the Committee on Finance, and under the rates in the 1918 act, which I propose.

Table No. 2 shows the estimated tax which would be yielded, by classes, under the present law, under the bill proposed by the committee, and under the rates in the 1918 act, which I propose.

Table No. 3 is a comparison of taxes paid and the percentage of taxes paid on net incomes under the British law, the present law in the United States, the rates in the House bill, those in the bill proposed by the committee and the 1918 act.

Table No. 4 is an estimate of the net income which will be reported by the various classes under the present law and under the act of 1918 as applied for the fiscal year 1933.

Table No. 5 shows the estimated returns which will be made for the fiscal year 1933, by classes, under the present law and under the act of 1918.

Table No. 6 shows the actual rates of percentage of tax to net income under the present law, the bill as it passed the House, the Finance Committee bill, and the act of 1918, by classes.

Table No. 7 shows the income taxes which will be paid by individuals on net incomes of certain classes under the law since 1918, under the bill passed by the House, under the Senate committee bill, and also the amounts paid under the British law.

I send these tables to the desk for insertion in the RECORD.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, before the tables leave the Senator's hand, can he state now for the RECORD the total yield estimated under his proposal, the total yield estimated under the Senate committee bill, and the total yield at the present time?

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator mean from income taxes alone?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. The report made by the Senator from Utah shows that it was estimated that under the bill sent to the Senate from the House there would be an income of $211,000,000 from income taxes. I want to point out that included in that amount is the sum of $89,000,000 which is estimated as the return from taxation on dividends. That was complained of as being double taxation, because a corporation before the declaration of dividends would have paid the normal tax. But the House decided that when a stockholder receives dividends, he shall be required to pay taxes on those dividends.

The committee, therefore, cut out of the bill the enormous sum of $89,000,000, on the claim, a justifiable claim, that it was double taxation. So when the committee reported the bill to the Senate it had changed the normal rates from two, four, seven to three, six, nine. That in itself, it is contemplated, will increase the receipts from income taxes from $29,000,000 to $59,000,000. Then we increased the other rates so as to receive $96,000,000, as against $93,000,000 under the House rates. In the aggregate, therefore, from income taxes the committee expected to raise $155,000,000 additional.

The rates now proposed will, in the judgment of many, including Mr. Parker, of the Joint Tax Committee, increase the revenue $486,000,000 above the returns under the present law. From that we deduct what the committee expects to raise, namely, $155,000,000, which leaves the proposal raising $331,000,000 more out of income taxes than the committee expected to raise.

That estimate is disputed by the Treasury Department. They say that they would expect to raise only $193,000,000 more from these rates, and, therefore, there is a difference between the estimate by Mr. Parker, of the Joint Tax Committee, and the Treasury officials, of $138,000,000.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And these figures include no corporation tax figures at all?

Mr. COUZENS. Absolutely none.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator.

The tables submitted by Mr. COUZENS were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. COUZENS. Before I sit down I want to answer some of the questions raised yesterday.

Let us assume that our estimate is too high and let us take the Treasury Department estimate. I think it is pretty well established that we can not rely too much on Treasury Department estimates, and especially is that true when they do not want anything done. I recall that during years past the Democrats wanted to reduce taxes more rapidly than the Republicans did, so the Treasury Department every year underestimated the receipts and underestimated the surpluses, and as a result of those estimates the taxes were kept higher than the Democrats wanted. I was in entire sympathy with the Treasury Department views at that time, so I was perfectly willing to accept their estimates. Now they are estimating these incomes at a lower rate, in my opinion, than is justified. But let us, for the argument's sake, accept the Treasury Department's estimate of the increased revenue from the 1918 rates over the rates in the bill reported by the Finance Committee. If we take the $193,000,000 which the Treasury Department says we will get from these increased rates, we can eliminate from this bill the tax on lubricating oil, which it is estimated will amount to some $35,000,000.

Just think, Senators, we are proposing to tax the wheels of industry $35,000,000 by a tax on lubricating oil. We are inviting industry to speed up, we are inviting industry to start, we want machinery started, but we say, "Before you start, however, you must pay us $35,000,000 in the way of taxes on lubricating oil."

That is one of the absurdities in the bill. We can remove the tax on rubber, another tax to hold back production. We can eliminate the tax on automobiles, another strangling act of Congress to curb consumption and production. We can eliminate the tax on children's chewing gum, $2,000,000. We can eliminate the tax of $11,000,000 on the radio, a device which everybody ought to have for the purpose of keeping in touch with world affairs. We could take at least $20,000,000 off representing taxes on admission to theaters. So, in the aggregate, taking these off, we would reduce the estimated tax receipts from these items some $194,000,000 alone, by simply adopting this plan and accepting the Treasury Department estimate, which I contend is entirely too low.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan what amount of increased revenue he proposes to get under the provisions of his amendment which would increase the normal tax as proposed by the committee from 4 per cent to 6 per cent on the first $4,000 of net income. From the speeches I have heard on the subject it would seem that the impression prevails that the amendment is an increase only on the large incomes, but as I read the amendment and compare it with the bill as it passed the House and the rates as fixed in the bill by the Senate Committee on Finance, I see the Senator's amendment starts in the very lowest brackets to make very large increases in the tax rate.

His is not merely a proposal of increasing the tax in a very substantial way on the large incomes, but there is a big increase in the tax on the $4,000 net income and alike on all of the smaller incomes. The House rate was 2 per cent on the first $4,000 net. The Senate committee recommends 4 per cent. The amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan proposes to increase that to 6 per cent. In other words, under the Senator's amendment the man who has a $4,000 net income is to have his tax rate increased 200 per cent over the amount fixed in the bill as it passed the House. In the next bracket, including the second $4,000 of net income, the House provided for a 4 per cent income tax, while the Senator from Michigan proposes by his amendment that it shall be increased to 12 per cent, or an increase of 300 per cent.

He also proposes by his amendment to reduce the exemption. The House proposed to reduce the amount of the exemption from $3,500 to $2,500. With that recommendation the Senate committee agreed and recommended an exemption of $2,500. The House also recommended $400 exemption for each minor dependent, and the Senate committee agreed to that and reported the bill with that provision. But the Senator from Michigan now proposes in his amendment that married persons and the heads of families shall not have $2,500 exemption from income tax, but their exemption shall be reduced to $2,000, and that they shall not be allowed the mere pittance of even $400 for each dependent minor, but he wants to decrease that to $200.

As I view the amendment and compare it with the provisions of the bill as recommended by the Finance Committee and as it was passed by the House, it seems to me that the effort of the Senator from Michigan is not only to get an increased rate as applicable to those enjoying the larger incomes, but that he is just as diligently going after those who have the smaller and more insignificant incomes. He does not propose to allow the average American family, say with three or four children, a sufficient exemption for them to live in reasonable comfort and educate their children. He wants to cut the exemption down to $2,000.

I would like to know what amount of revenue the Senator from Michigan proposes to raise out of people having only small and medium incomes? When we have the data on this point, I dare say it will show that a major part of the $331,000,000 additional revenue, which he suggests his amendment will raise, will be paid by people having only small and moderate incomes. If that is true I do not want to support his amendment. If the Senator has any data on that point, I wish he would supply it to us.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The Senator referred to the average family. The average family will not come within the income-tax tables at all. The average American family does not make as much money as will bring it within the lowest income-tax provision unless it be reduced to something like $1,200 or $1,400.

His tax then would be less than he would be penalized by the application of a sales tax, as the Senator very well said yesterday. If he is going to be penalized, it will be done in the lower brackets. For instance, take the man who pays an income tax on $3,000. There are not very many people in America making $3,000 to-day. What would be the amount of income tax such a man would pay, may I ask the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the tables covering the various brackets are shown in the charts which I have placed on the wall of the Senate Chamber, and the Senator can get the information there.

Mr. LONG. A man making $5,000 would pay only $189. A man making $3,000 would probably pay less than $100. I have not the table before me, so I can not get the exact figure.

Mr. SMOOT. He would pay $60.

Mr. LONG. What man is going to say that a person making $3,000 is not going to be affected by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan? Three thousand dollars is not the average income. The average man will make less than $3,000. The average man is not making $2,000 a year. The average man would be considered prosperous if he were earning sufficient income to be required to pay $40 or $50 income tax on it. If we are going to have a sales tax, the average man with five or six children consumes as much, ordinarily speaking, if he has the money to spend, as the man who makes a considerable amount more than that, and he would pay considerably more in taxes than though he paid a very small income tax. I think if the Senator will quiz the ordinary men in the ordinary constituency all of them would say that they would be happy to know that they could come within the $3,000 class to-morrow and have to pay the Government $40 or $50 or $60 a year.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I do not think it will add to a man's opportunity or possibility of getting within that class to place an increased tax upon him and remove from the head of the family the exemption which he has heretofore been allowed. The House recommended an exemption of $2,500 and the Senate Finance Committee recommended an exemption of the same sum. I take it that the Senator from Louisiana desires to allow not even the present exemption for the support of a man's family, the education of his children, and other obligations upon the average citizen but proposes, as does the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, to levy a tax beginning in the lower brackets, to tax him before he has sufficient income exempt for the purpose of caring for his family and educating his children. That is the point I am making. We should not begin increasing the income tax in such low brackets. We should not take away a reasonable exemption from income tax. It has not been done at any time heretofore, I think, even during the war.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If a man were to fall within the brackets of $3,000 or $5,000 or $6,000, he pays no taxes except to the Government of the United States, and a tax of $40 or $50 or even $100 a year would not be burdensome; but it seems to me we can not afford to lose sight of the fact that the bulk of all local taxes, county and district, city and State, are paid by the men who come within the range of incomes from $3,000 to $6,000 or $7,000. It is hardly fair to cite the possibility of a man's willingness to pay taxes provided he were guaranteed an income of $5,000 a year, which can not be given by the Government or by anybody else. The great bulk of local taxes, which after all constitute the burden of government in this country, are being paid by the small incomes, who would be emphatically at a disadvantage under the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TRAMMELL. People coming within the brackets of incomes from $1,500 to $5,000 or $6,000 per annum have, as the Senator said, more of the State, county, and municipal taxes to bear, and they also have upon them in large the maintenance of the civic organizations and local public enterprises of their respective communities. They have a great many more financial burdens upon them than can be responded to by the person who has not the means to make those contributions. These matters are worthy of serious consideration.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. It strikes me that a man making $5,000 or $6,000, who would pay $60 a year income tax on the one hand, as provided in the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, would be in a better position than if the amendment is defeated. If the amendment is defeated, that man is going to pay an equal amount, if not more, in sales taxes. What the man who is paying the tax is interested in is how much he is going to pay. If he does not pay that amount in income tax, then the tax on automobiles, admissions, and so forth, will take it, not out of his right-hand pocket but out of his left-hand pocket. The man in the $3,000 to $5,000 class is going to pay substantially so much tax anyway. The question is whether we want to take it from his income, as a direct tax upon his income, or from some place else as a sales tax.

Mr. TRAMMELL. He will never pay it through a general sales tax with my vote. Probably the Senator from Maryland proposes to vote for a sales tax, but I have never favored the sales tax. I opposed it as vigorously as I could when it was presented here several years ago.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator let me clear up that matter? I had no reference to the sales tax as such. I was simply pointing out that under the terms of the bill the taxes on admissions and automobiles, telegraph and telephone messages, and what not, would all be eliminated if the amendment of the Senator from Michigan were adopted, so it is not a question of a general sales tax. It is a question of whether or not we are going to take from the same class of people the equivalent of $60 through all these nuisance taxes or take it in the form of an income tax.

Mr. TRAMMELL. On the basis of the normal tax, a man who is engaged in business will to a considerable degree pass on to the consumer the amount of his tax that has to be contributed to the Government, and it will indirectly be imposed upon the person that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] talks about with a $1,400 income just the same as it would be under the imposition of a sales tax. The person who is making $5,000 or $6,000 or $8,000 or $10,000 per annum engaged in business, of course, is going to include in his profits the amount of money which he has to contribute in the way of an income tax under the normal tax. Of course, it has been claimed that under the surtax bracket he can not do that very well.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to invite the Senator's attention to the fact that a man with a net income of $3,000 under the proposed amendment would pay $60 income tax. Under the provisions of the House bill he would pay $3. Under the provisions proposed by the Senate Finance Committee he would pay $4. The difference between $60 and $3 is $57, and that would pay a lot of admission taxes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Assuming that that man buys an automobile for $1,000, how much of a tax does he pay on that?

Mr. SMOOT. He pays the regular percentage.

Mr. TYDINGS. Four per cent, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then he would pay $40.

Mr. SMOOT. That is $20 less than he would pay under the other plan.

Mr. TYDINGS. Assuming that he went to the moving pictures 20 times, how much would he pay in the way of tax?

Mr. SMOOT. It would be $1.

Mr. TYDINGS. Assuming that he uses the telephone, how much tax would he pay in that way?

Mr. SMOOT. I would have to know the number of telephone calls he made.

Mr. TYDINGS. Assuming he went to 10 ball games a year, how much would he pay in the way of a tax on those admissions? Pretty soon the Senator would find himself away over the $60, and he would have bothered the man every time he conducted a transaction of any kind.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator from Utah let me correct him on one point? The Senator used a phrase which I think is quite misleading. He referred to the man with a $3,000 income. I said a man with a $3,000 net income.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course.

Mr. COUZENS. And there is a great deal of difference between a man with a $3,000 income and a man with a $5,000 income who has a $2,000 exemption. So when we are talking about a man with a $3,000 income paying $60, what is meant is a man with a $5,000 income after he has taken off his $2,000 exemption.

Mr. COUZENS subsequently said: I merely want to make a correction in the RECORD before it is too late. In the colloquy with the Senator from Utah a few moments ago I made an error in my statement, and I want now to correct it. I said that the man with a $3,000 net income would pay $60 after he had deducted his exemption. What I meant to say was after he had deducted his tax and interest payments and other deductible items, instead of after deducting his exemption. I was confused for the moment between the exemption and the deductions allowed by law.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will be through in a few moments, but I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. I wish to quote from the Senator's remarks yesterday, because I was more impressed by them than I was by anything else in yesterday's RECORD. I read them this morning while in bed. Here is what the Senator said yesterday:

> Personally I think that if we have the alternative of having either to accept this tax or to accept a sales tax, this, of course, is preferable. So far as I am concerned, however, I am not favorable to either one. I am not in favor of making this big reduction in the exemption, nor am I in favor of a general sales tax.

The point I am making, and the point which the Senator from Maryland made, is that if it is necessary to raise revenue either by a sales tax or by going to the lower brackets and increasing taxes there, say, on the $5,000 net income, certainly the Senator's views of yesterday are the views that we ought to follow. That is the point I am making.

Mr. TRAMMELL. My views of yesterday have not been altered in the least by the discussions which have taken place as to the comparability of a sales tax with an income tax and the exemptions thereunder. I said that I was, of course, more opposed to the sales tax than I was to some increase in the income tax, but I am not going to surrender and yield as if it were inevitable that we will have to have the exemptions reduced in the consideration of this measure on account of the scarecrow of the sales tax. That can not be used with me as a scarecrow. I do not believe a majority of the Senate are in favor of a sales tax; I am sure I am not. I reiterate that I think the situation, as distressing as it may be, is not so desperate that the exemption should be reduced from $2,500 to $2,000 and that the deduction for dependent minors under 18 years of age should be reduced from $400 to $200. I am very much opposed to that feature of the amendment of the Senator from Michigan. I am also opposed to that feature of his amendment—a number of amendments grouped in one, it might be called—that makes such an enormous increase in the rate of tax upon small and moderate incomes. That is what his amendment plainly does.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The difference between a heavy tax on small incomes and a tax upon admissions it seems to me to be so obvious as to need no comment. A man who wants to go to a baseball game where 50 cents admission is charged would pay a nickel. If he does not want to pay that nickel he does not have to go to the ball game; he can stay at home; but if the income tax be increased on the man of small income there is no way for him to escape it; it is compulsory; the Government reaches its arm into his income and takes out a certain percentage, regardless of what he may do. So it seems to me it is quite unfair to compare the compulsory features of an income tax on small incomes with the voluntary features of a luxury tax upon admissions, which are more or less for pleasure. Everybody can escape the payment of such a tax by not going to the amusement places. The tax, however, is not so burdensome as to keep them away, though they might not want to pay.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not think there is any analogy between a so-called amusement tax and an income tax. Of course, the automobile tax is different. I do not think we should increase the automobile taxes on the people of this country.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] that if we had a tax on clothing, for instance, a man might go without clothing to avoid the tax, and if we had a tax on food one could starve himself to death and thus would not have to pay the tax. So it is up to a straight, invisible line, where it would be difficult to say whether he ought to be taxed or not. If we want to take away from the American people all their pleasures, all their luxuries, and a good share of their necessities of life, we can do it by simply levying a sales tax, and saying, "You do not need to have a given article; you do not need to buy it; and therefore you can escape the tax." A father can tell his children that they do not need lead pencils when they go to school; that they do not need any books; that the family does not need a baby carriage; they can get along without it—and they may—and that the children do not need to go to the moving pictures, no matter how a parent may suffer when he sees the children of other parents going to the movies and finds it necessary to keep his little ones at home. They can save money by staying at home.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska is always interesting and frequently facetious. There is no sales tax in this bill, and, so far as I am concerned, there will not be.

Mr. NORRIS. But there will be one in it before we get through if we do not adequately tax the big incomes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not by my vote, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska. I do not favor the general sales tax and I do not intend to vote for it; and there is nothing in this bill and nothing will be in it, I hope, that will tax food or clothing or any other necessity. I should certainly vote to exclude any such taxation; but it certainly is not accurate to say, because a man can stay away from a baseball game and therefore need not pay a 5-cent tax upon the price of admission, that is to be compared with compelling him to go hungry or naked. There is nothing in any bill that I know anything about taxing clothing or food, and I would not favor any such tax. The illustration of the Senator from Nebraska is not at all analogous.

Mr. NORRIS. If a man wishes to go to a baseball game and can not see the game and get his dinner both, he can go without his dinner in order to go to the ball game.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I decline to yield further at this time. I did not expect to occupy the floor except for a very few moments, but I wanted to give expression to my protest against this effort to increase all the way from 100 to 300 per cent the tax upon the people of this country in the lower brackets of income and to withdraw from them the privilege of an exemption of $2,500 and $400 for each dependent child under 18 years of age in the case of the head of a family, as is proposed by this amendment. That is my attitude. I have always taken the position that those who are best able to pay should pay; I have no objection to taxing those who have fabulous, enormous incomes; but I do not approve of the policy proposed by this amendment of imposing such an enormous increase upon the taxpayers of small or moderate or intermediate incomes; and that is what the amendment, among other things, proposes to do. I dare say that the greatest part of the increased revenue is going to come from that class of people under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Florida, if he is opposing this amendment only on the ground stated, that both the provisions to which he objects are subject to amendment. I think there is some merit in what the Senator from Florida says, but this amendment is subject to an amendment making the exemption $2,500 instead of $2,000, and increasing the allowance for each dependent child from $200 to any other amount that may be deemed desirable.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I agree with the Senator; and I had in mind that when we reached a vote I would ask for a separate vote on those particular amendments. I suppose that will be the procedure followed in regard to all amendments, but on these particular ones I want a separate vote. The Senator from Michigan proposes to strike out the exemption of $2,500 and insert $2,000.

Mr. NORRIS. An amendment by the Senator from Florida to that effect would be in order at any time before the vote, as I understand the parliamentary situation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The proper parliamentary procedure is not for me to propose an amendment; it is for the Senate, if it deems proper, to vote down the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan. The Senator from Michigan has proposed an amendment to strike out $2,500 and insert $2,000 in the exemption feature of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not yield to the Senator for another speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor and declines to yield further.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I do not wish to be put in a false attitude. The Senator suggested that I propose an amendment. It is not a question of proposing an amendment but of voting upon the one that is proposed.

Mr. NORRIS. The way to get a chance to vote on an amendment is to propose it. I am not particular whether it is proposed by the Senator from Florida or by some other Senator. The Senator from Florida has the same right to propose an amendment as has any other Senator. If he wants to get a vote on the direct question of increasing the amount of the exemption instead of leaving it as it is in the amendment, it is subject to amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is not necessary to offer an amendment amending the amendment in order to get a straight vote on all these brackets. The Senator from Michigan has offered his amendment as a substitute for what is in the bill. If that is voted down, then an amendment may be in order as to any of the provisions of the bill as it stands.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not understand it in that way. I think Senators would make a great mistake if, for the reason that they object to one particular item such as the exemption on account of a dependent child or for the head of a family, they should ask us to vote down this entire amendment. The way to reach the result is to make a motion to change it before we vote on the amendment.

Mr. President, it is always one of the most unpleasant things imaginable for a lawmaker, in a time of depression, to vote increased taxes on the people. I assume that only where a legislator believes such an increase is absolutely necessary and can not be avoided does he feel justified in casting such a vote. It is unpleasant to increase taxes; it is particularly so when people are in a distressful condition, as the entire country now is.

But, Mr. President, we are confronted with the situation that our Government is running behind; the income of our Government is not as great as its expenses. Everybody knows that that condition can not continue indefinitely and the country live. Yet, I am not one of those trying to scare everybody by saying we must balance the Budget to-day. I think that if it is done within a reasonable time there will be no material injury to the country or to any of our people. However, the fact does remain that we must by taxation raise sufficient revenue to pay the expenses of government. In order to make that easy, we are confronted with the other proposition that we must reduce the expenses of government. It is conceded that we can not reduce the expenses of government sufficiently to make up the deficit. Hence, there is only one thing left to do, and that is to increase taxes; and when we are confronted with that proposition the next question is, Where are we going to levy the taxes? In a time of distress such as this, which, so far as our financial and economic conditions are concerned, is comparable to the war days, every man and every woman who believes in the perpetuity of our Government and of our institutions must be willing—and if they are patriotic, they are willing—to do their part, regardless of the cost, regardless of how we got into this condition. That may be another question upon which we greatly disagree. If that question were discussed, we might say we were not to blame for our condition. Whether we are to blame or whether we are not, however, we are confronted with the fact that we must produce more revenue in order to keep our Government going.

It seems to me those propositions can not be and will not be disputed.

When we come to the place where we are going to levy this tax, there will, of course, be disagreement. My own personal opinion is that when we met in December we ought to have gone into the subject of unemployment then, meeting it fairly, as I think we did not, and ought to have provided a method by which we could have put to work millions of our people who were then and will be again next winter, and to some extent are now, dependent upon charity for food and clothing. But that water has passed over the dam. I have not had my way. Congress, led by the President, did not do then what I think it ought to have done; but we have had to go along and do the best we could. So, regardless of the cause, we have to raise more money from some source.

I think it will be conceded by most economists and most people who have studied the subject that when we come to raise money by taxation, we must and ought to go to those sources where the money can be collected with as little hardship as possible upon the people who have to pay it; and as between the man who has but a living to begin with and the man who has a surplus, we must take the larger portion of our levy from the man who has the surplus. We ought not, if we can help it, to levy a tax anywhere where it will be a hardship; but again we are faced with the fact that whatever we may think individually about where the taxes on incomes should be levied, we have no chance of passing a law that will levy upon the big incomes the tax that I think ought to be levied unless in the same connection, perhaps, we make a levy upon those who can not so well afford it.

I dislike, in this amendment, some of the levies upon the lower brackets. I would rather not make those levies as heavy as they are made; while I think those levies in some instances are a little bit higher than the necessities require, it is doubtful even now whether we are going to adopt an amendment that will make levies upon enormous wealth and upon big incomes that will be sufficient at least to make the necessary contribution to the wiping out of the deficit.

Of course, there are other things in the bill as to which we do not know now whether they are going to stay in or not; we do not know whether the rates are going to be increased or decreased. When we get through with them all we can probably vote more intelligently even upon this amendment than we can vote now. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], however, puts into effect an old law, one that was in existence, one under which levies have been made in the past, and it is, therefore, a matter of history how it operated, and whether it inflicted any great hardship upon any of the people from whom the money was taken by the levy.

In considering an income tax, in my judgment it is just as important to consider how much the man has left after he has paid his tax as it is to consider the rate of the tax. Can we make this levy and still leave in the hands of the men who pay the tax a sufficient amount of money to permit them to live, do business, and not suffer?

An examination of the schedule of incomes and the rates of taxation on the various incomes, it seems to me, must convince any person that no real hardship will be inflicted. In some of the lower brackets the tax will bear down rather heavily, but we must remember, in considering these levies and these various brackets, that the income referred to is always the net income, not the gross income. So when we speak of levying a tax upon a $5,000 income, we mean $5,000 net. All of the exemptions allowed by law, which amount to quite a large item, comparatively speaking, are always deducted before the tax is levied. The exemption of a married man is greater than that of an unmarried man. Whether it is too great or whether it is not great enough I concede is a debatable question upon which honest men will differ; but in considering it and passing on it we ought to take into consideration the necessities of the case, the difficulties confronting our Government, the means by which it is going to increase the taxes, and levy them sufficiently high to pay the expenses of government, and then say that within reasonable limits of income all people ought to be patriotic enough to bear some portion of that expense.

This amendment would levy on a net income of $1,000,000 a tax of $703,030—in round numbers, $700,000. In round numbers, now, the man with a million-dollar income pays a tax of $700,000. That is a big sum of money, but his income is big. Who ever earned a million dollars, as a matter of fact? And what does he have left after he has paid his tax? Three hundred thousand dollars net. That ought to keep the wolf from the door.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I have no doubt the Senator has thought, however, of the fact that in many of the States there are income taxes; so that there would be subtracted from the residue by the State a considerable income tax.

Mr. NORRIS. There is still quite a margin there, quite a difference to go on.

Mr. KING. If the State imposed anywhere near the tax that the Federal Government imposes, he would be in a minus position.

Mr. NORRIS. No, no; oh, no!

If a man had a net income of $500,000—that means after paying all the expenses of operating his business, whatever it may be, and all his taxes except income taxes—he would have, in round numbers, $200,000 left.

Mr. President, I can not conceive of a man who is permitted under our laws and under our Government to make in one year a net profit of $1,000,000 who is not willing to pay the amount specified here to the Government under whose laws he lives and under whose laws he is permitted to make this outrageous fortune in one year, if he is as patriotic as he ought to be. It seems to me that in these times of awful distress, when his fellow men by the million are hungry, when he sees little children upon the street half-naked, when respectable people are unable to clothe their children in order to send them to school, when they are unable to buy the books and the other things necessary for the child when he goes to school, the man with $200,000 net in his pocket ought to feel as though he is really a favored individual.

Now go on down. This proposal increases pretty nearly everybody's tax to some extent. Take the man who has a net income of $100,000. He would pay a tax of $35,000. Do you think that is exorbitant? It might be under ordinary circumstances, but these are not ordinary times. Here you are with an income of $100,000 net. You have taken out your expenses. You have taken out your taxes. You have $100,000 left. In this terrible depression, which has been well described as equal and similar to a condition of war, your country says to you, "In order to keep your country alive, in order that it may continue to live, we ask you to contribute, out of that $100,000, $35,000 to save the country that permitted you to make $100,000." Is that unfair? Is that unreasonable?

Then go on down. The man who has an income of $50,000 net, under this bill, will be required to pay a tax of $11,000. He will have $39,000 net left. After paying all his expenses and all his other taxes, he will have $39,000 clear upon which to live for a year.

Mr. President, in these terrible times, when danger can be seen ahead unless something is done to prevent it, ought not every patriotic citizen to be willing to say, "I will thank God if you will permit me to live and not even go into the red. I will be thankful if you will let my books be balanced even, and let me come out with a good living." Thirty-nine thousand dollars ought to do it; and you could go to the baseball games and chew all the gum and do all the other luxurious things that you wanted to do with $39,000 net.

Suppose you had an income of only $30,000. After you had paid your taxes and all your expenses, how much would you be required to pay? You would have to pay $4,930; in round numbers, $5,000. That would give you $25,000 clear to live on for a year. If you were economical, and very careful about your expenses, and smoked a cob pipe instead of a cigar, you could get through on $25,000. Now, speaking to the man who has a net income of $25,000, there are millions of men who have families just as good as his, whom they love just as he loves his family. There are millions of men who have no income, who are dependent upon charity for their food, who have to depend upon their neighbors and friends to contribute the shelter and the food that will take care of their wives and their children. What do you think of those people? While they are living on charity, you have $25,000 net. What is there you want to get in these days of distress and financial bankruptcy, what is there you want to get for yourself and your family which you can not buy with $25,000?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator knows my anxiety and the efforts I have made to get some money for the starving people of my State and city. My observation is that after we get money into the Treasury, we can not get any of it out to do the things which the kind-hearted Senator has in mind. If we collect these millions, we do not have anything to give to the poor. We are denied that privilege on every occasion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator knows I have not agreed with those in control as to relief of distress. I have not been one of those who tried to bring about that denial. I am not finding fault with the Senator. I admit that what he says has a lot of merit in it. I do not believe that we have taken the right course so far. I do not believe we are taking the right course now. I think we were justified last December in issuing bonds, using the money for the making of public improvements, particularly building roads, in order to put the millions of unemployed to work, to put to work the men whom we have to support anyway, the people we have to feed anyway, the ones we have to keep warm and clothed anyway; and it will take the money in any case. But I would rather put them to work, and they would rather go to work, God knows, than to be subjects of charity. But we are now confronted with the necessity of bringing in enough income to support our Government. So the question raised by the Senator, important though it is, is not before us at this moment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Senator from Illinois and I tried hard to add an amendment to the Finance Reconstruction Corporation bill to permit loans to cities for human relief. We could not get that through, and we will not get anything through now for that purpose, so far as I can see. But I want to say this, that when the "banksters" in New York refused to lend any money to the city for human relief the people of income did. They gave us $17,000,000 last winter to relieve distress in New York. If the $17,000,000 which came from those people voluntarily for human relief had been taken away from them and put into the coffers of the Treasury, I doubt exceedingly whether the people who were fed by those $17,000,000 would have had 17 cents from the Treasury of the United States to relieve their distress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, that may all be true; but let me ask my friend from New York, what has that to do with the levying of this income tax?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator was making the argument that these people can well afford to give the money which we need for the support of the Government, and I think that is true, I am not disputing that. But I do not want the RECORD to fail to show that they did something for human relief when the Government of the United States and the Senate of the United States and the Congress of the United States did nothing.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, Mr. President; but it did not all come from the men who had the million-dollar incomes. Much of it came from the clerks, from the laboring people. Take this city as an example. How much money was raised during the winter that has just passed, and how much did the men and the women who are working by the month contribute? In round numbers, one-half of all the money that was raised for charity in the city of Washington came from the people who are working by the day and by the month.

Mr. COPELAND. I join the Senator in applause for what they did, and what such people did in my city, but I do not want to fail to give some praise to the others who contributed.

Mr. NORRIS. Nor do I.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I would like to ask the eminent Senator from Nebraska his judgment on the following test: If this Government shall proceed to levy the proportion of tax the Senator has just described, practically consuming two-thirds and sometimes practically the whole of the large fortunes, does the Senator think those who have made fortunes will again make an effort to make another, and will put people to work and into employment, and undertake their business further, if it really is to be wholly confiscated by the Government under the cry of necessity?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator might as well ask this question, If we levy a tax on the man who is getting $3,000 a year, as we will, probably, are we going to discourage him so that he will quit work next year, or quit work forever? If we levy, as we would under this amendment, a tax of $830 on the man receiving $10,000 a year, is he going to quit? Do you suppose he will stop and say, "You make it impossible for me to go on, and have taken so much of my income in taxes." Yet we have left thousands and thousands of dollars to the big-income man where we have left a penny for the $10,000-a-year man.

Let me answer the Senator's other question. The Senator is wondering, if we tax these big incomes, whether the fellows who have the big incomes are going to quit business. We taxed them in 1918, and they did not stop then. They went on climbing up the financial ladder higher and higher. Suppose they should stop. If we have to get the money somewhere, we must go where it is, and if all the people who pay taxes strike we will not get a penny, and our Government will be chaos in 24 hours; it will be gone.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I answer the Senator by calling his attention to the fact that the tax of 1918 has an equity which appeals to us all when we reflect that most of the fortunes of that day were made by the profiteers, who made them after we entered the war, or in the years just before.

I reply, then, to the Senator as to the $10,000-a-year man, and the $3,000-a-year man, and the millionaire. What I ask the Senator is his judgment, which I greatly respect, as to this question: Would not the men thereafter begin to limit their production, and since the $10,000 man saw that $3,000 was being taken from him, would he not gradually limit his capacity to nothing further than serving his need? Would he not cut off the opportunity of employment of many in the larger undertakings that did produce the profits to which the eminent Senator alluded? That is my fear.

Mr. NORRIS. I say no; he would not. It is not the experience of history. It seems to me it is contrary to good business judgment; and if it is true that people are going to do that we might just as well throw up the sponge. If the man with big income and the man with little income are going to so shape their business that they will not have any taxes to pay, we will not collect anything for the Government; that is true. If they do that, it will be a demonstration of the fact that our country is almost unanimously unpatriotic. Then we can say to almost all the people, "You do not love your country. You want it to fail."

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I was just wondering whether the Senator could mention any Senator who would resign because he was going to be taxed $830 on his salary.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator address his query to me?

Mr. COUZENS. No; it applies to the Senator from Illinois, but I was asking the question of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I respond that if any Senator has chosen this body and been elected here for money he ought to be put out before the question comes of the quantity he receives.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, but the Senator receives his $10,000, whether he came for that purpose or for some patriotic purpose.

Mr. LEWIS. His motive of service is not resting on his pay; and it may be assumed that when he gave up his business, whatever it was, and took this office as a servant of the people, the impetus and incentive was service to mankind and not to himself in dollars and cents.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, but the Senator seems to forget that he may be speaking of himself alone. I know Senators who are here for their salaries.

Mr. LEWIS. I regret that they hold their seats, if that be their only purpose.

Mr. COUZENS. And they have just as much right to hold their seats for their salaries as a lawyer or a doctor or a professional man or an engineer has the right to hold his job for his salary. I do not so underestimate my capacity as to contend that I hold this position wholly from patriotic motives. I contend that I am worth my salary.

Mr. LEWIS. We who know the Senator from Michigan and are familiar with his labors here deny that he is stimulated by anything except a desire to render patriotic service for the benefit of his fellow men.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I enjoy this colloquy immensely, and from it I think I can draw a very beneficial lesson. The Senator from Illinois in his eloquent way has called our attention to the motives which animate men to action, and he says that Senators are not here for their salaries, that they are here to perform a patriotic service. When the Senator intimates that the man with a million-dollar income, if we tax him on it, will stop making money, so that he will not have to pay his taxes, does he mean to intimate that that fellow is not patriotic? If the Senator's assumption is correct that we are here from patriotic motives, must we not attribute patriotic motives to the man with an income of a million dollars? If he is patriotic, would he be so mean, so inconsiderate of his fellow men and of the country which enabled him to make this great income to say, "I will not make a cent" or, at least, "I will make less than $3,000 this next year in order to save paying taxes"? In other words, the man with a million-dollar income would receive, net, $300,000, and he is so unpatriotic that next year he will not make more than $3,000 in order to save paying taxes to the Government. While he is doing that he will not have his $300,000 either. He will lose his $300,000. If he is not called upon to pay any taxes, instead of having $300,000 to play with he will not have anything. So even if he were not so patriotic as a Senator is, it would be good business for him to go on making his million-dollar income, if he could.

Mr. President, I think that all these people are patriotic. I do not follow the Senator in his theory that these people would be so unpatriotic and be so unbusinesslike as not to make any money so as to avoid paying taxes. When we get in that condition we will not need a Senate; we will not have a Senate. We will have, as one of the Senators suggested the other day, a Mussolini.

I want to invite the attention of the Senator from New York. I was going to do it a moment ago, when I was interrupted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator mean interrupted or instructed? [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. Both! The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] spoke of men with great incomes who make contributions to the poor. Those contributions are deductible under the law, within certain limits, of course, so the contributors will not have to pay taxes on them anyway.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, the amount of tax they would save in that way would be infinitesimal.

Mr. NORRIS. It depends on how much their contributions are. If they make very material contributions it would not be infinitesimal. It might be for them, of course, but it would not be for me.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is surely going to give some credit to these men, even though they have the misfortune to be rich, if they contribute some of their money for human relief. The point I have in mind is this——

Mr. NORRIS. Just a moment! What have I said that induces the Senator to suggest that I am trying to impute to these rich men any wrongful or unpatriotic or dishonorable motives?

Mr. COPELAND. I do not think the Senator intended to do that. From his suggestion that because they have an exemption or they can obtain a credit because of some contribution, I got the idea that perhaps the Senator thought they were making the contributions in order that they might get such an exemption.

Mr. NORRIS. I never intimated any such thing.

Mr. COPELAND. I am very glad indeed to know that.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think I said anything from which the Senator could draw that kind of a conclusion.

Mr. COPELAND. The fact remains that rich people in New York City have given millions to relieve human distress when the city of New York could get no money from the banks in order that the city might give the relief, and when the Congress of the United States refused to grant the privilege to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of giving or lending money for that purpose. I am not defending the rich man who seeks to evade his taxes. I think the man who is rich and has an income ought to be glad to pay a tax. But I know that there are millions of people in the country to-day who are hungry. I had a letter this morning, forwarded to me from my New York office, saying that yesterday a mother of seven children came there for help because she had no food in her house to give the children and no milk for the baby. There must be found some way to give relief to such people. My contention is that the Senator, by getting all the money the rich people may have and putting it into the Treasury of the United States, is not contributing to human relief.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator would like to let the existing deficit go and say to the millions of hungry and unemployed of the United States, "Go to charity and get your relief." I do not believe in that. I want to tell the Senator, as I tried to tell him before, that while there are many men rich, many men poor, who have made wonderful contributions to charity—and I have not intimated anything to the contrary—there are, nevertheless, many hidebound millionaires who have not contributed a penny to charity. The only way to get those men's contribution is to levy a tax against them and get it by law.

Mr. COPELAND. I agree with the Senator. I know there are many hidebound millionaires who have put all of their property in tax-exempt securities.

Mr. NORRIS. If they do they help the taxpayers, who thereby have less interest to pay on those tax-exempt securities. At least that much can be said for them.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator and I are not separated by the thickness of a sheet of paper. We want human relief and we have no prospect of getting it from the Congress of the United States. When the President talks about a paltry $250,000,000 or $300,000,000 for human relief, how absurd it is when we know there are 10,000,000 men and women in the country without any money whatever and without any means of help from private charity because the Government must not violate the theories of political economy and make any contribution for human relief.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all very nice, but it has not any more to do with this amendment to levy a tax to enable the Government to balance the Budget than the flowers that bloom in the springtime. The men who are going to contribute will contribute whether this amendment is adopted or not, and those who are not going to contribute will not contribute whether it is adopted or not.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York calls attention to tax-exempt securities, and I want to say just a word about them. I think there is an erroneous idea in the country to-day about tax-exempt securities and their evil. I want to preface what I have to say by making this remark: If I had my way, there would not be such a thing as a tax-exempt security. We originally voted during the war to exempt Liberty bonds. The first issue was entirely exempt. All the issues after that were only partially exempt; they were exempt only as to normal taxes. I voted against those provisions. I would be glad to vote for a tax on the salaries of State officials just the same as on the salaries of Federal officials. I would vote for a tax upon the municipal bonds of every city and of every county and of every State. In other words, if I had my way there would be no such thing as tax-exempt securities. But I do not have my way.

Some of the greatest lawyers in the country believe, and apparently the opinion of 90 per cent of the Members of Congress is, that we have no constitutional authority to tax municipal bonds, county bonds, and State bonds; that we have no constitutional authority to levy an income tax upon the salary of a governor or of a State judge or of a member of a State legislature. For practical purposes we must assume that to be the law. The theory is that the right to tax probably could mean the right to destroy. I do not want to enter into a legal discussion now, but I have always believed and I still believe that in theory there is nothing wrong about taxing State securities and the salaries of State officials. If we undertake to levy a tax upon them that is different from the tax upon other officials, where it is conceded we do have authority to levy a tax, then the constitutional objection could be raised.

But I concede to begin with that my idea does not prevail, so we have tax-exempt securities, and we can not avoid it. The evil which has come from that kind of securities has been, in my judgment, greatly exaggerated. In the first place, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] showed yesterday by statistics that the great fortunes of the country have not been invested and are not being invested in tax-exempt securities.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The fact is that municipal bonds that are tax exempt have usually an interest limit. As an example, in the State of Louisiana our bonds are limited to 5 per cent. We have sold those bonds as low as 4½ per cent. Had we not a tax exemption, the bonds could not have been sold at 4½ per cent and much of our financing could not have been done at the constitutional limit. When we commence talking about taxing securities which are now tax exempt we are not proposing to do anything but take the money out of the pockets of the State and put it in the pockets of the Federal Government, making it all the more difficult to finance the public projects of the States and of the United States to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator. He has really anticipated me. I was going to make the point he has just made. It seems to me perfectly clear. If people invested all of their incomes in tax-exempt securities they would be unable in those States to make all the internal improvements at a very much reduced cost. Everybody knows that a county bond in the State of Utah, for example, exempt from taxation, goes on the market at a lower rate of interest than though it were taxable. That is absolutely true. It is the same with every other tax-exempt security. If they were not tax exempt, the rate of interest would be higher and the people who pay the taxes, who must pay the interest and the principal of those bonds, would have to pay the extra cost. After all, we would be taking it out of one pocket and putting it in another pocket. To my mind it is almost immaterial—one hand washes the other—and the only reason why I would tax them all would be because it would relieve the country and the Federal Government in particular of the idea which is almost generally prevalent that we are suffering from the existence of tax-exempt securities.

Let me refer to Federal bonds, our Liberty bonds, for instance. The first issue of Liberty bonds were sold at 3½ per cent. They were tax exempt, exempt from State and Federal taxes. Inheritance and State taxes applied to them. They sold at 3½ per cent interest and except during the depression they have always been above par on the market. We paid as high as 4½ or 5 per cent before we got through borrowing money. We have now outstanding a large amount of Federal bonds drawing 4¼ per cent interest. At the present time, or the last time I looked at the figures, these bonds were selling a little above par, but for weeks during the depression they were below par. I presume if we looked at the sales on the New York Exchange on yesterday we would find the 3½ per cent bonds being sold above par or at least at par. If they were taxable, the rate of interest would have to be higher on all of them, so it is just as long as it is broad, and it does not make any particular difference.

Mr. President, who are the people who invest in tax-exempt securities as a rule? I believe I can use an illustration, perhaps. Members of the Senate, whose time is taken up with their duties here, who have not any time to look after their private business affairs. They probably invest their money in bonds, whether they are tax exempt or not, because it relieves them of the necessity of giving them any attention. Another class of people are those represented by large estates and insurance companies, such as are required to keep large amounts of money invested in bonds as securities, or trustees of estates, charitable institutions, and so forth. They invest not for speculation but for safe investment, not expecting a large return, but one that is certain and about which there is no risk involved.

As the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] showed yesterday, most of the tax-exempt securities are held by estates and widows. They are not held as a matter of fact by the men who pay the big income taxes. If we look them over and see the dividends they have paid in the past, we will see the reason why they are considered good investments. It is considered good business to make such investments. If a millionaire buys a million dollars' worth of bonds, he pays a million dollars, or something like that, for them; and whoever gets it uses the money. It does not make much difference whether he uses it or whether the man who sells him the bonds uses it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I should like further to invite the Senator's attention to the fact that the supposed era of tax-exempt securities, and it may be said also the era of high income levies, was the very period when private capital on large scale controlled by men of great fortunes extended its operations more than ever before into private fields, taking in the stores of the country, the banks, and the oil companies. They were not attracted by tax-exempt securities. There never was such an era for taking over of the business of the country as there has been since tax-exempt securities have been on the market.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is literally true. There never has been a similar period in the history of this country when such operations have been carried to a greater extent than since tax-exempt securities began flooding the market.

Mr. President, I do not want to detain the Senate, but I want to say in conclusion that I look upon this question as a serious one; I think it is one of the serious things connected with the pending bill. Here is an opportunity to levy a tax that will not hurt anybody. The burden will fall upon those who are able to bear it. We have got to place it somewhere. Let us forget our prejudices, if we have any, and realize that somewhere we must levy this tax; from some source we must raise this money. It seems to me we can not hesitate to say it is easier and better for everybody if we raise it from the sources that have money in plenty and in proportion to the amount they have than it is to raise it from taxes levied upon the already overburdened poor.

So it seems to me we ought not to hesitate to adopt this amendment even though we do not agree, as I do not, with the rates suggested in all the brackets. This is an amendment that levies its toll upon the rich and the moderately situated. The average citizen is going to have his taxes increased, but not nearly as greatly as is the rich citizen with a large income. Remember always if they do not have incomes they do not pay the tax; it is no burden upon anybody who does not pay the tax; and the amount to be paid depends upon the amount of income. If the income is big, the tax is big; if the income is small, the tax is small. So it will levy tribute in proportion to the ability of people with incomes to pay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate shall have concluded its business to-day it take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. I am just wondering, Mr. President, as I think are other Senators who are interested in this particular legislation, if it is possible for us to reach some kind of an agreement?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean as to a time for a vote?

Mr. HARRISON. An agreement as to a vote or as to a limitation of debate, either.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that beginning Monday at 11 o'clock all speeches upon the pending amendment shall be limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. LONG. I object.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I feel a question of that kind ought not to be submitted with so sparse an attendance of the Senate. A larger number should be here to accept this proposition, if it is acceptable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as there is objection, I withdraw the request.

Mr. LEWIS obtained the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I was going to suggest, not to interfere with the Senator from Illinois, that possibly it would be well that we should take an early recess this afternoon. I see no reason for staying here. So I suggest that the Senate take an early recess this afternoon, as other Senators seem to desire that such action be taken.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] desires to speak. When he shall have concluded, if no other Senator desires to address the Senate a recess may be taken.

Mr. LONG. We will not vote on the amendment to-day, will we?

Mr. SMOOT. No; we will not vote on it to-day.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, do I understand from the eminent chairman of the committee, the Senator from Utah, that it is not contemplated to vote to-day on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure that we can not secure a vote on it to-day. I hope, however, that on Monday we may have a limitation of debate.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, listening to the observations of Senators SMOOT, NORRIS, and COUZENS on this tax bill, I rise to submit some conclusions on the pending tax bill as I view it. The country may behold that there are no divisions here in the Senate as to which is the Democratic measure and which is the Republican. For myself, I do not know what Democrats favor one or the other. I have not been able to attend either counsel or consultation in either conference or assembly by which I could deduce what is either desired by my party or would be practicable to its welfare as a political party. I present whatever views I have as a Member of this body representing a State whose people must respond to this tax, whatever it may be.

From my point of view, contemplating the country as I see it and as I feel all my countrymen must perceive it, I regard this tax bill a wholly unnecessary procedure. From my point of view, it can not be justified upon the basis of any argument that rightfully considers the present situation of the Nation and the just rights of its citizens.

Here is a tax upon America designated as the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill. That tax remains in all its horror of application and the severity of its burdens. The only relief that gave some promise and afforded the possibility of some benefit was presented by the eminent Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the leader of the minority on the Finance Committee. It has just received its congé, as it were—its disapproval and veto—by the President of the United States. This was on the day before yesterday. That particular veto laid low to its burial any hope that might have been indulged for benefit or relief under the proposition, though it was accepted by the Senate and adopted by the other House.

In addition to that tax, all the other taxes remain upon the books—corporation, personal, internal revenue—like a brand of pickles, 56 varieties, all exacting in their persecuting form the response of the citizen from his pennies to his dollars, and from his dollars to his property, and from his property to his income, and from his income to his business, and from his business to his hopes. All hang over the citizen and still pend above him as a cloud of fire, with all the threats and their dire disaster.

The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] brought to the attention of this body a moment past how the Treasury, though overflowing, perchance, with the accumulations of money drawn there by the ferocious and impelling hand of taxation, would still contribute nothing to the immediate needs of those who are without bread and without shelter. This because every method devised to appropriate the money immediately in the form of relief is interdicted in some form by the eminent officials in power who reserve the right to veto the popular will, however expressed, and this even when it runs counter to the political advantage of those who hope to be returned again to power by the same methods that have been administered in the Republic and brought them to life and have brought upon the Nation such affliction as it now endures.

Then we ask ourselves the question, What does the present tax bill do? It levies further taxes, first, upon income. I agree with our friend and benefactor of public welfare, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], that the matter of income does not seriously disturb the Senators. There are none of them here who rose to acknowledge that they were those whose incomes were of the million-dollar class nor having such expectancy. But we pause to consider those rightly earned incomes which we are under oath and by sense of duty bound to justly protect as honest property of the constituents for whom we speak.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that that is exactly what the committee has done. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that an individual living in the United States with a net income of $3,000 under the House bill will pay $3 and under the Senate Finance Committee bill will pay $4, while an individual living in England, having exactly the same net income, instead of paying $3, will pay $303. What would the Senator do? Would he exclude all citizens from paying taxes whose net income—I do not mean gross income but net income with all the allowances provided by law—does not exceed $3,000 a year? All they pay now under the bill is $4 a year.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator seems to labor under the idea that my remarks are addressed in opposition to the income tax. He forgets that we both sat in this United States Senate as Members when I was allowed the privilege and dared the audacity to present, as one of the floor representatives of the Democratic side of the Chamber, the very income tax bills that were the first and second under the Constitution which allowed them. The Senator must not fall into the error of supposing, merely because of the preliminary observations I have made, that it is my purpose to oppose an income tax wherever it should justly be levied.

I recognize that we have at present a law that does levy these income taxes. I seek neither its repeal nor its qualification. I speak of what I object to now in detail.

I object to a new tax bill being put upon the country where, from my point of view, as will be revealed in a moment, I find it wholly unnecessary. Second, I object because I feel that the method of its adoption or the means of its enforcement does not remedy a situation which should be remedied, and which calls for immediate relief by another system more practicable and more serviceable to those necessities. I mention them.

I first answer the Senator's comparison with England. I am not interested in the comparison, however much respect I would pay to any suggestion from the eminent Senator from Utah. My answer is, This is America and not England. Our wealth and our income, our position and our situation, can not be used as a parallel to the situations of England, either from the war, her population, or her necessities.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon a question?

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, surely; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. Has the Senator from Illinois never been sent to London?

Mr. LEWIS. I have been sent officially to London. I have been honored in some slight regard in that respect by this Senate and a former President of the United States; but if the eminent Senator means to parallel my being sent with the privileges granted the late Secretary of the Treasury, with such honor as is afforded him and such privileges as attend him as Secretary and Ambassador, I answer never, nor do I hope to occupy that confusing sphere. [Laughter.]

But I return to mark for a moment the point I wish to indent.

I feel that further tax bills than now in force are wholly unnecessary and, as I see it, wholly unjustified; I mean in addition to the tax bills that are now levied upon the Nation. I now tender from my lips in speech a substitute for the new tax bills proposed. It is that this Government lay a bond issue on the Nation of $5,000,000,000; that it be so arranged in its construction and adjustment as to exempt the present generation from the burden of its interest and principal proportionately; that it place the burden of the payment of the bonds upon that other generation that will enjoy the benefits of the Government but has not been compelled either to bear the burdens of the war in conflict or its expense of Government paid to the Treasury.

If the private interview I observe between my friend from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] and my friend from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is not wholly confidential, I should like to hear it for my enjoyment. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will yield, the Senator from Utah and I were discussing whether or not we would suggest that the Senator exempt the next two generations.

Mr. LEWIS. If the distinguished Senator has in contemplation his dearly beloved young ones, I would, out of regard to them, consider that, of course. [Laughter.]

I return, Mr. President, to say that I would then with this bond issue, and from its results—which would come from all over the world—since the nations of the earth, having no confidence in their own securities, largely from the fact of such conditions as the eminent Senator from Utah has described in the case of England, they would promptly purchase these, our securities, in preference to any of the world—from the results of the sales I would pay the deficit which is being spoken of constantly as that which calls for that euphonistic aphorism of "balancing the Budget." [Laughter.]

There is no effort whatever to cut the Budget in the places where it should be deflated and where it should be decapitated. The whole theme seems to be, however largely multiplied it is in burden or however severely it may oppress the citizen, to leave it, and to harass the citizen further by draining from him additional and multiplied taxes to equal that heavy proposed expenditure in the Budget without any regard to its equity or its justice in an hour like this bearing upon us.

May I ask the eminent Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER in the chair], than whom there is no nobler or better gentleman representing his State, has there been any proposition of reducing the millions and millions that are to go into the Columbia River, I venture? Does the eminent President of the United States intimate that reductions should be made in the $800,000,000 that is to go to the Hoover Dam, or these like projects directed for contractors' profits, or is there any suggestion of diminishing the plan of "beautifying" the city of Washington by tearing down buildings in scores, turning them into sand and eruption and building in their places temples for admiration and habitation, social and commercial, such as the establishment for the Secretary of Commerce? What movement is being made to overcome all this by desisting temporarily from spending this almost billion and by doing so relieve the citizen of the necessity of meeting by taxation these ill-considered and heartless exactions on the taxpayer?

I merely mention these few as illustrations. Therefore, again to return, I say that this bond issue shall first pay the deficit. Then with the deficit paid, Mr. President, I propose that the remaining sum shall go to such proper public undertakings as will give employment to that vast number who are waiting patiently, dreaming hopefully, trusting confidently that from this body they will have their relief. Sirs, I say that in their days of patient waiting they exhibit a patriotism and a devotion to their land which better marks the character of the American than that described by my eminent friend from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] or the eminent Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] of these who, better clad, better supported, more supplied in bank account, may show their patriotism merely by paying the surplus of their possessions to the Government in the hour of its extremity. Then, turning the remaining sum drawn from the bonds to the maintenance of those who have a right now to ask at the hands of the Government just service, and full pay to the soldier, as may be his due. In this way, I point out, we would meet the Nation's demand; we would start the Government again along the road of prosperity.

And now to the eminent Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and my friend from Louisiana, Brother LONG, I respond: Then let the income taxes as they are now adjusted in the present existing law go to the payment of the ordinary daily expense of government; and then let us levy an adjusted tax upon inheritances. I do not mean the same rate upon all inheritances. All inheritances should not be taxed equally because they are the same sum in quantity. Inheritances which have passed into the hands of those who have honestly applied them in business and sought to extend them to industry and give employment to individuals and equally multiply the opportunities of their country should be guarded and protected with proper caution and justice. But let me allude to the others. Those which have passed into the hands of the putrid sons of the financial scion. They who spend their time capering upon their yachts in distant waters, accompanied with their diamond-bedecked Delilahs as their companions of joy, while the tendrils of tinkling music as their accompaniment of sweetness drown all sense of responsibility to citizenship. Those whose offenses in different parts of the land cast a corruption upon this America and reflecting upon its honor, leave it the dastardly object of scorn from every land of the world. Let this kind of inheritances, being used for the pollution of the generation, be early seized in a very large sum and be compelled to pay the Government that which would carry it on further in the other things necessary to honest life of noble citizenry and put embargo on the multiplication of the generation I describe, alluded to in St. Matthew as the generation of vipers and all uncleanliness.

Thus you will observe that from the bond issue and its results, from the income taxes properly proportioned in the law as it now stands, and from the inheritance tax that I mentioned, we will have had a sufficient sum in total for all the immediate purposes of this Government, without levying one dollar extra upon the immediate business of the citizen, stressing his home, straining his life, frightening his project, and leaving him in the future with an uncertainty that seems to paralyze every prospective hope of prosperity in America.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is not far from the kingdom in what he is saying, according to my ideas of what a perfect kingdom is. Just how would he designate this "putrid son"—by amounts?

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator means to ask how I would designate the amount of the tax?

Mr. LONG. I mean, we want to locate the man who answers to this description; and I think the Senator is right about that. I agree with him entirely.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I know I am right. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. If the Senator did not know that before; but how are we going to locate this party? I thought perhaps the Senator had an idea along that line.

Mr. LEWIS. Does my friend mean how I would locate the amount and quantity of the tax, or how I would locate the individual?

Mr. LONG. The individual. The Senator referred to this man who has so much money that he can sail the high seas, or the lowlands, or the low waters in his yachts, with diamond-bedecked parties along with him.

Mr. LEWIS. Did I say "parties"? I think I made that singular, because it is singular indeed to have it occur. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Oh, did the Senator do that? That is probably due to age. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. That may be self-applied to the Senator. I do not know to whom else he could appropriately apply it. [Laughter.]

I answer my friend to say every State of the Union has its form of tax collector locally. I would say to the energetic and I may say ever-consistent Senator from Louisiana in his championship of the common masses, that those individuals who hold the office of county tax collector, such as he knows in Louisiana, over which State he has presided as executive, knows the particular citizens of that county. The State officer knows those of the State; and in that manner these individuals who come under one description or the other are easily tallied, and their general whereabouts is invariably advertised by their habits. Thus they will be located, and I trust none of them will escape and never be deserted by the tax authorities, when we come to consider their kind and their worth.

But I must conclude.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I do not think that description can be written into a law. The only means I see by which we can lay the tax on inheritances that the Senator proposes is by fixing certain limits beyond which an inheritance becomes useless, or nearly useless.

I do not think the Senator from Illinois or any other Senator would contend that we could write into the law that the one who is accustomed to riotous and abandoned living shall pay so much tax, and the one who spends his time working shall pay less. I think, and I was hoping the Senator might agree, that the proper method—I have proposed an amendment to cover that point—would be that after an inheritance reached a certain amount we should begin to lay on the inheritance tax, so as not to make it too heavy for the man who needs the money in industry.

Mr. LEWIS. It may be that placing a limitation beyond which a larger tax may be levied would have a certain equity in it. We have in the past adopted such a course; but one of the reasons why I can not subscribe to a resolution that shall limit the amount of wealth to be possessed by anyone earning it, is that I fear it would limit, at some time and maybe too often, those who earn and then apply that large wealth inherited to the noble undertakings of helping mankind with their surplus—in hospitals and educational institutions, in business and commercial enterprise, in works of religion and welfare. I desire to avoid punishing such as these and depriving the community of the blessings they confer. I hesitate to lay on those such punishment as would bring upon my country the loss that would follow, merely through seeking to tax the limited number who come under the anathema of my eminent friend who correctly characterized that number. They whom in every year we see advertised by their habits—not by their fruits, but by their sins, do we know them.

Now, Mr. President, having occupied more time than was my intent, I conclude my suggestion, as it partakes this moment of only a suggestion, in order to define and explain my purpose in tendering a substitute for the whole new tax bill. I ask, what other way can now be provided for these needs of the times and the necessities of our country?

The eminent Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] has made an allusion to when he and I jointly on this floor tendered an amendment which would have given the Government the privilege of extending loans to cities and States from the billions advanced for use to the finance construction board. I sought a relief to the State of Illinois, to relieve the conditions of great depression she was under, and the experiences of misery and oppression her citizens endured. I saw that city suffering from a plight which her best citizens could not be charged with responsibility for. Her school-teachers not being paid. For months they were without the ordinary necessities of life and deprived of sustenance and maintenance. I wanted the police and the officers of government of Chicago promptly provided for, to the end that government should go on; so that which we have heard so often described on this floor in flaming tongue—the lawlessness of the land—could not be encouraged by the consciousness of the criminal that those whose duty it was to obstruct that lawlessness by the enforcement of the law were put out of commission, from the fact that they were put out of employment for lack of compensation.

When we sought this relief, eminent gentlemen on this floor denied the right, because such action would have been something of an innovation upon the older theories of government, in conflict. It was contended that such conflicted with constitutional construction.

To-day, however, the President of the United States, as published in the press, concedes the theory. He now, with commendable courage and justice, puts his new adaptation on the ground that the private relief which heretofore has been held up by the White House as being wholly sufficient has failed to serve the purpose, and that the method of applying to the Federal Government for the distribution of loans to the cities and the States is the one remaining in which there was some hope of relief. For this we all commend and support our Chief Executive.

Yet I can not refrain from saying that since, sir, the principle is now conceded, the great mass of people will flash the inquiry to the White House, "Why, for six months, have you let us hunger and starve, our children die for want of food, not a shelter over their heads in the cold enduring hours of a miserable existence, when, if the principle is right now, it was right then?"

Where is the man who can justify the manner we parleyed and played with these situations, until we brought them now to where a surrender is made before the world, and by it we confess that this, our great America, stands with her citizenship with her hands held out to charity, beseeching the mercy of the Government to the sustenance and the life of American citizens who tendered, in numbers upon numbers, all they had of life and honor to save their country.

It has reached the end. This Government must not longer play with these vicissitudes and miseries; and since there are methods now conceded through which these remedies can be had, these reliefs enjoyed, let us enter upon them—here and now enter upon the duty that we may realize our great United States in the fulfillment of her mission, caring for her people, lifting them to the heights of honor, holding them high in independence, from which we, too, may point to this as the assurance of patriotic support from her sons in any national peril as we paraphrase the poet Browning and proclaim to the world:

God's in his heaven,
All's well with America.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I made some observations this morning in regard to the proposed increase of the income tax in the lower brackets suggested by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]. At that time I was without any data to support my position, but I felt confident that I was correct in asserting that a major portion of the increase which he contemplated by his amendment would be taken from the people of this country of small and only medium incomes.

I have before me—and I believe it has been sent to the desk since I made those observations—a table compiled either by the Senator from Michigan or some one serving him, showing the amount which his proposed increases will provide. I am not going to take the time to put the entire table into the RECORD at this time but will discuss it probably next week.

I find from this table that persons in that bracket having net incomes of from one to two thousand dollars only under the present law, pay, in the gross, $1,100,000 annually. Under the bill recommended by the Finance Committee persons with net incomes of from one to two thousand dollars only would contribute $17,800,000. Persons with incomes of from one to two thousand dollars, under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, would contribute $40,572,000 in the way of income taxes. Persons receiving net incomes of from one to two thousand dollars per annum would therefore, under the Senator's amendment, contribute about $39,000,000 more toward the support of the Government, under this one tax, than they are contributing at the present time.

The Senator's amendment would increase the total amount on incomes of from one to two thousand dollars, over the rate proposed by the Finance Committee in the bill we are considering, from $17,800,000 to $40,552,000; the increase in the tax upon this class of taxpayers being $22,772,000, according to the Senator's own statistics. In other words, people paying taxes on incomes of from one to two thousand dollars would, if we adopted the Senator's bracket on this particular rate, contribute over $22,000,000 per annum more than they would under the bill proposed by the Finance Committee.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I would like to get this consecutively in the RECORD, if the Senator will pardon me for not yielding now.

The Senator from Michigan proposes big increases all along, beginning at the very lowest brackets. Let us take, according to his own table, incomes of from two to three thousand dollars net. I do not think anybody can say that we would be swatting the rich if we swatted the man with an income of two to three thousand dollars a year net. Some seem to be basing their support of the amendment on the idea that they are going to swat the rich, that we are going to make the people with big incomes pay. While we were doing that, if that is the idea—and I do not believe in that kind of a policy; I believe in treating everybody fairly—while we were doing that, I do not know whom we would be swatting more than the poor man who makes only one, two, three, four, or five thousand dollars a year net income.

In this bracket of incomes of from two to three thousand dollars the present law provides a rate which brings in a return of $2,730,000. The Finance Committee bill would provide a revenue of $18,200,000. The amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan would provide a revenue of $49,624,200. In other words, he proposes to increase the rate prescribed by the Finance Committee on incomes of from two to three thousand dollars so that the return would jump from $18,000,000, in round figures, to $49,000,000. He proposes to increase it more than 100 per cent.

In the three to five thousand dollar net income bracket, at present the taxpayers pay only $5,120,000. Under the bill proposed by the Finance Committee they would pay only $28,500,000. Under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, they would pay $99,000,000, an increase of $70,500,000 from those with incomes of from three to five thousand dollars, as against the bill of the Finance Committee.

I have not had time to compile these figures into groups, except as to incomes of from one to five thousand dollars a year. We see how the Senator's amendment discriminates against the people of this country who are making merely slightly more than a bare living, probably just a small amount above the ordinary living expenses.

On net incomes of from one to five thousand dollars, under the present law we collect $8,950,000, according to the Senator's statistics. On incomes of from one to five thousand dollars, under the bill proposed by the Finance Committee, the collection is estimated to be $64,500,000. Under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, on incomes of from one to five thousand dollars, the estimate of the collection is $189,196,200. In other words, if we adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, on incomes of from one to five thousand dollars we would collect 300 per cent more out of the people in that bracket than under the bill proposed by the Finance Committee, the difference between $64,000,000 and $189,000,000, practically 300 per cent more. A tremendous increase of the taxes on the people of such moderate incomes.

Under the rates proposed by the Senate committee in these first brackets, covering incomes of from one to five thousand dollars, the rates suggested in the amendment of the Senator from Michigan would provide $124,696,000 in excess of the amount collected under the rate proposed by the Finance Committee.

Those are the features of the bill which I thought it proper to bring to the attention of the Senate, because as far as I am concerned, I can not support those provisions of the Senator's amendment. If I had had opportunity to group the figures so as to include incomes up to $10,000 a year, I am sure the figures would have astounded Senators. The tax would average at least 300 per cent more than under the rates proposed by the Finance Committee.

My observation was directed at that particular policy of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, and also his effort to cut down the exemption of the head of a family from $2,500, as proposed by the Senate Finance Committee, to $2,000 and to cut down the exemption of $400 for dependent minors under 18 years of age to $200.

I did not mention one feature which I have since noticed in his amendment. The Senator from Michigan proposes to do away with the provision relating to earned income. He wants a person to make just as much money out of capital as out of his individual efforts and labor. He has proposed that in his amendment. For years we have carried the earned-income provision in our tax laws. I think it has been regarded as a very wise policy and a very just policy, upon the theory that a man's earnings from his endeavors and his labors, his talents, and his energies, should have a little recognition over the earnings that come from capital investment. But the amendment of the Senator from Michigan proposes to strike that provision from the text of the bill as reported by the Finance Committee.

I wanted these figures in the RECORD which I have taken from the statistics of the Senator from Michigan. I wanted them to appear in connection with my observations to-day. That is the reason why I have offered them this afternoon. Unless he sees proper to change his amendment, which proposes such big increase in the tax upon these low incomes and moderate incomes, I shall feel impelled to make some further observations when we again reach this feature of the bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I desire to reoffer the amendment which I originally proposed, with the paging changed in order to conform with the new print of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie upon the table.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, among the letters I have received from day to day respecting the agricultural situation are some that convey clear notions of the farmer's plight. I invite attention to one that came to my desk this morning. It reads as follows:

The Reconstruction Credit Corporation bill was passed with the promise that it would aid the farmers. But the farmers in this part of Iowa are saying they have received no help. The newspapers give it out that money has been granted to banks, but if it has been loaned to banks it is not in this part of Iowa; at least no banks, so far as I can hear, are making loans to farmers.

All the banks in this city were closed. We had five. Fourteen out of seventeen banks were closed in the county. A new bank was organized in the city and has taken in about $650,000 in deposits. In its report a week ago it shows it has made loans of $29,000, or less than 5 per cent of its deposits, and out of this $29,000 which was loaned, $18,000 was loaned to an investment company, a subsidiary of one of the closed banks; so that less than $11,000 was actually loaned to depositors.

This new bank showed by its report that it had bought and held $650,000 of Government bonds, which meant that about $650,000 had gone out of this city and county to buy Government bonds which are nontaxable, and left this community without any source for furnishing money either to farmers or business men. This bank announces that it will loan only to persons who own Government bonds which can be put up as collateral.

Farmers need money to renew mortgages on their farms, but such banks as we have make no loans on farms.

I wrote to the land bank in Omaha for a farmer asking for a modest loan to take up a mortgage of $9,000, which was on his farm and held by a savings bank which closed its doors in October, 1931. The land bank at Omaha replied, "We make no loans for renewal purposes." The result is the farmers are losing their farms and are getting bitter. In this county 64 foreclosure suits were filed in the May term of court, twice as many as were ever started before at any one term in this county.

Here is a striking statement:

I give you a concrete illustration of what farmers are going through. A farmer here shipped a 215-pound hog to market on May 7, 1932. He got a check from the commission company for his hog. The check was for 5 cents! This 215-pound hog sold for $1.60. The statement for this transaction is as follows:

Yardage	$0.13
State weight charge	.01
Commission	.35
Fire insurance	.01
Transportation charges	.95
Total	1.55

This hog which brought the farmer 5 cents, after expenses were paid, cost him more than $10 to raise.

And yet, Mr. President, the western railroads are to-day asking the Interstate Commerce Commission for a 10 per cent increase in rates on grain, and that despite the fact that the rates are now 44 per cent higher than they were prior to 1914.

To continue with the letter:

Illustrations of this kind can be multiplied without end. Can you blame the farmer for seeing red?

I beg of you that you appeal to your fellow Senators to pass some measure that will give the farmer a chance. If this is not done soon, a revolution as destructive as the French Revolution is liable to break out in this country.

This may sound like radical talk, but when men are driven off their farms and are hungry they will not stop at using force to gain that which their labor and sacrifice have produced. When that time comes it is going to be hard on the politician and the wobbly executive for neglecting the plea of the farmer for the last 10 years.

Mr. President, during this session we have done nothing for the farmer of a constructive character. There are industries which are highly profitable despite the depression. The power industry—and I am speaking of the operating power companies throughout the country—had a gross income last year of about $1,900,000,000. Assuming the gross income in 1929, the boom year, as 100, the income in 1930 was 102.7 and in 1931 it was 101.5. For the first three months of this year the operating power companies of the country received but one-fourth of 1 per cent less in revenue than they received during the boom year of 1929. Here is a source of revenue to tax.

I am inviting attention to this fact: That there are industries highly prosperous even now, while the farmer is in despair. Yet Congress has done nothing for him during this session, although both parties pledged themselves in their 1928 platforms to enact something constructive for the farmer's relief. But Congress has failed to do anything of the kind. Are we to adjourn without action on behalf of the farmer or are we, Mr. President, to go home and tell the farmer nothing but this, "There was not the will in Congress to act in your behalf"? Agriculture must be rescued if prosperity returns to the Nation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I sympathize very much with what the Senator has said not only to-day, but at other times. I myself think that the Senate ought to do something if it possibly can. I am going to ask this question in entire good faith and sincerity. Has the Senator proposed any concrete remedy for the situation that confronts us? Has the Senator any concrete proposal before any committee of the Senate?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, reviewing the situation that exists at this time, and the short period that remains before Congress adjourns, I came to the conclusion that about the only thing we might get through Congress at this late day would be something with which Congress is familiar. Therefore I have had in mind the McNary-Haugen bill, twice enacted by Congress but vetoed each time. My notion is that possibly we could not get such a bill through Congress including all products, but we might get such a measure through both branches of Congress providing for an experiment with one product.

As a consequence I have introduced such a bill providing for one product, and I have left the name of the product to be determined by the committee, trusting them to select the product that would best serve the experiment. I felt that thus we might at least afford the farmer a consolation prize in the way of an experiment, if nothing more.

Mr. JONES. Let me suggest to the Senator that instead of pointing out that we are likely to adjourn in a month, I should like to hear him say we are not going to adjourn until something is done for the farmer. We do not have to adjourn so soon. This is not a limited session. I think it will be much better if we would notify those in authority that we propose that we shall do something for the farmer before we adjourn.

I might say that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] just advised me that his committee has reported a measure along the lines suggested by the Senator from Nebraska. That has been done this morning. I think at least one bill has been reported in that connection, so there is something here upon which we can act, without saying that we must adjourn without doing anything.

Mr. HOWELL. Indeed, I thank the Senator for his expressions at this time. I have known what his attitude has been and that he would be in favor of constructive relief for agriculture.

EXPENSES OF ALABAMA SENATORIAL CONTEST

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I again ask unanimous consent to take up and consider Senate Resolution 213, the resolution in respect to the late contest involving the Senatorship from the State of Alabama. The resolution was regularly introduced, referred to the appropriate committee, reported favorably as amended, and is upon the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, what is the request of the Senator from California?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Before answering immediately the Senator from Mississippi I wish to add that the resolution as amended is satisfactory to both the contestant and the contestee, the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who I believe is now present in the Chamber.

Here is the resolution as amended, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi, which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, authorized by resolution of February 28, 1931, to hear and determine the pending contest between John H. Bankhead and J. Thomas Heflin involving the right to membership in the United States Senate as a Senator from the State of Alabama, hereby is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate $30,000 in addition to the amount heretofore authorized for such purpose.

The resolution as originally introduced, may I say to the Senator——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am not going to raise any objection to the consideration of the resolution, because I do not know anything about it; I am not on the committee. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] says that he consented to it, I believe; but if there is any question about it, of course, the Senator from California will consent to a reconsideration of it on Monday?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Unquestionably.

Mr. HARRISON. Because there is a sparse attendance here and some Senator may be interested who is not present.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Let me add that the resolution originally called for $35,000, but was amended to authorize the expenditure of $30,000. I would not again have asked that the resolution be taken up, considered, and adopted until I had been advised, as I have been advised, that the Senator who objected this morning would consent to have the resolution taken up, considered, and disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from California if he refers to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the resolution, but it is understood that the committee will canvass the situation before any of the money shall be disbursed?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is the understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution which had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with an amendment, on line 7, after the word "Senate," to strike out "$35,000" and insert "$30,000," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, authorized by resolution of February 28, 1931, to hear and determine the pending contest between John H. Bankhead and J. Thomas Heflin involving the right to membership in the United States Senate as a Senator from the State of Alabama, hereby is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate $30,000 in addition to the amount heretofore authorized for such purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

CONDITIONS IN COAL-MINING INDUSTRY IN KENTUCKY

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the Senate has before it and the Committee on Manufactures is considering a resolution providing for an investigation of conditions in the coal-mining district of Kentucky. It appears suitable for the information of the Senate that an Associated Press dispatch, published this morning in the Baltimore Sun, with reference to conditions in Kentucky be incorporated in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Saturday, May 14, 1932]

INJUNCTION DENIED KENTUCKY PROBERS—JUDGE, WHILE NOT BARRING THEM, SAYS THEIR LIVES WOULD BE IN DANGER—PARTY TO GO, HOWEVER—JURIST CHANGES MIND ABOUT ACCOMPANYING CIVIL LIBERTIES GROUP TO MINE AREA

LONDON, KY., May 13.—Members of the American Civil Liberties Union investigating party will have no injunction to protect them when they enter the southeastern Kentucky mine area. Federal Judge A. M. J. Cochran denied their injunction petition to-night.

Simultaneously Judge Cochran announced he had changed his mind and would not accompany the party to the coal fields. In court last night he said he intended going with them to afford his personal protection.

SAYS DANGER IMPENDS

In denying the injunction Judge Cochran said he was not holding they had no right to enter the mine area, but strongly advised them not to do so in the face of testimony their lives would be in danger while there.

Arthur Garfield Hays, Ernest Sutherland Bates, the Rev. Charles C. Webber, Dr. Broadus Mitchell, of the Johns Hopkins University, all from the East, and the Rev. Eugene Sutherland, Louisville minister, promptly announced they would go to Bell County to-morrow regardless. Dudley Field Malone, international lawyer, who accompanied the group, said he was undecided whether he would make the trip.

The 78-year-old jurist said there was no evidence introduced at the hearing showing officials of the mountain counties had "acted in bad faith" in ejecting other delegations of investigators. His opinion was delivered orally. He urged the union delegation to appeal his decision, saying he would welcome a ruling on it by the Federal circuit court of appeals.

The judge said he would not accompany the delegation because he did not wish to be placed in a position where anyone might say he approved of their investigation.

"I agree with you," he said, "in your desire to protect the right of free speech, but I do not believe it advisable you go to our mountains to do it in the face of present conditions.

CITES CRY OF "FIRE"

"You advanced the notion here that you have the right to go down and condemn these officials for action which they took to prevent a breach of the peace. You can't express the ideas attributed to you in your own evidence here without doing that. Courts have held that it is unlawful to shout 'fire' in a crowded theater. Your proposed action under the conditions described as prevailing in Bell County would amount to that."

Malone, in final arguments for the injunction, expressed disbelief such conditions could exist in Bell and Harlan Counties as described by citizens and officers of those counties. He said he opposed "assumption of dictatorship," which he said Bell Countians appeared to have assumed.

SAYS RIGHTS ARE NOT DENIED

Cleon K. Calvert, Pineville attorney, arguing for the defense, said the rights of free speech and free assembly were not denied in Bell County. Referring to the union, he said:

"We call their idea of free speech 'unbridled license' and our view has been upheld by the Supreme Court."

Asserting 95 per cent of the citizens of Bell County did not want them there, he remarked, "After all it's their community and I do not think they have the right to endanger the peace."

Hays, basing his argument on a quotation from Voltaire: "I disagree with what you say, but I would die for your right to say it," said he was "ashamed" that the right of free speech was being waged mostly by radicals, "who use it trying to undermine our institutions." He said communism was not the greatest danger of the present times, but fascism, and he compared the acts of Bell County authorities to fascism.

WOULD BE POWERLESS

Police Chief Pearl Osborne, of Pineville, said his police force would be as powerless as "a gnat in a storm" to protect them, and Sheriff J. H. Blair, of Harlan County, testified his entire force of 150 deputies would be necessary to fully protect the delegation.

Both officers said they would guard the delegation from violence if it was threatened in their presence, but Osborne said he "couldn't follow them around" because of other duties. Blair said he wouldn't go "very far out of my way" to protect them.

Judge Cochran, who yesterday pointed out that those who were to be investigated have rights as well as the investigators, commented during the hearing that it was possible the officers had a legal right to eject a visiting delegation.

Springer Robinson, a Harlan County mine superintendent, testified general sentiment was strongly against another delegation visiting the county, and that even the women were aroused to the point of action.

SURVEY OF INDIAN CONDITIONS—EXPENSES

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 717, being Senate Resolution 193. The resolution provides additional money for the expenses of the Subcommittee on Indian Affairs. The fund that we have is practically exhausted. We have made investigations in a majority of the States where Indians live, but the reports are not as yet all finished and we need more money in order to continue the work. The committee asked for $12,000, but the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate has cut the amount in two, making it $6,000, and we are willing to take that amount at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator how long he thinks this investigation is going to continue? My recollection is that it has been going on now for three or four years.

Mr. FRAZIER. The Indian question is a big one. We have a number of requests to visit States in which we have not been up to the present time, and I do not know that it will be possible for us to do so. We wish, however, to complete the reports on which we are working at the present time concerning the investigations which we have made. The money which we now have will not last more than through this session of Congress. I think that the reports can all be in by that time.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator think that the committee can possibly complete its investigation by next winter?

Mr. FRAZIER. I hardly think it can complete it, because, as I have said, the Indian question is a big one, and places that we investigated two or three years ago are now asking for further investigation. We can complete the work that we have done and perhaps carry on some few other investigations which we have been asked to make.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator think it is very likely when the subcommittee makes an investigation one year that two or three years afterwards they will not have to reinvestigate the same situation?

Mr. FRAZIER. That depends entirely, as I see it, upon the attitude of the Department of the Interior and the Indian Bureau.

Mr. JONES. It rather seeems to me that the committee ought to conduct its investigations independent of the Interior Department and of the Indian Bureau. I should like to see the investigation finished.

Mr. FRAZIER. When we make recommendations and they are not carried out by the department, a further investigation may be needed.

Mr. JONES. I do not see why the committee should make another investigation after one has been made and a report has been submitted just because the department may not carry out the recommendations. In that situation I see no reason why another investigation should be conducted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on a number of occasions I have expressed my disapproval of considering measures on the calendar out of order. I want to ask the Senator from North Dakota if the money provided by the resolution is needed right away?

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes; it is.

Mr. McNARY. Will it be needed between now and the next occasion when we have a call of the calendar?

Mr. FRAZIER. The attorney for the subcommittee and the stenographer who is working with him in preparing the reports have not had their salaries paid for the last month.

Mr. McNARY. I am sure we will have a call of the calendar within a day or two, and I think the Senator had better wait until that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

GOVERNMENT ECONOMY—ADDRESS BY SENATOR CONNALLY

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, on the evening of May 12, 1932, my colleague the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] delivered over the National Broadcasting radio hook-up in this city a notable address on the subject of Government Economy. I submit it for publication in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, the tender sympathy of America goes out to-night to Colonel and Mrs. Lindbergh. The Nation is shocked to learn that to the cruel crime of kidnaping has been added the dastardly and revolting murder of their innocent child. May the perpetrators of this foul and fiendish act of barbarism be apprehended and speedily punished by the severest penalties known to the law.

The Democratic National Committee has invited me to speak to you on economy and the reduction of expenses of the Federal Government.

No government has the right to spend a single dollar of the people's money above that necessary for the maintenance of an economical administration. Waste can not be defended. Extravagance is a breach of public faith. Squandering of public money is a form of embezzlement.

The tragic depression beginning in 1929 has converted business profits into losses; has changed private incomes into private deficits; has transformed a Government surplus into a staggering deficit of more than $3,000,000,000. During the two years ending June 30, 1932, the Government has spent $3,000,000,000 more than its income.

The Nation is faced by a financial crisis. The House, the Senate, and the President, without politics or partisanship, must meet the danger; the President's desire to be reelected ought to be submerged; Senators and Congressmen must forget their own fortunes; all must unite in a patriotic service to our common country. The truth can have no political bias. The truth bears no flavor of party.

In view of recent developments, which reveal a shrewd and cunning maneuver for political advantage, an artful and strategic maneuver designed to evade responsibility while invoking the responsibility of others, the public ought to know where and when the stupendous deficit was incurred. The truth is an impartial witness. The truth is not a candidate for reelection. Fairness and justice require that it be known that all the regular appropriation bills in which the deficit occurred were passed by the last Congress, not by the present Congress at all. Both Houses and the Presidency were in the undisputed control of the Republicans. Since March 4, 1921, continuously for 10 years, the Republicans controlled all branches of the Government. That wily wizard of finance, Andrew Mellon, was at the helm. He dominated the administration. For two desperate years after the panic of 1929 nothing was done to balance the Budget—the magic mariner sighted not the tempest—the captain on the bridge discerned no danger. Don't misunderstand me. The responsibility of a Republican President and Republican Congress for the deficit furnishes no excuse for Democrats to fail in their duty. No matter who is responsible, the deficit is a fact. It is here. The Democratic Party will not shirk. It will not dodge. It holds its duty to its country higher than party. It is willing to lay aside its arms—others ought to lay aside their daggers. Nonpartisan action must save the situation. Our weapons must be directed at the deficit and depression—not upon ourselves.

The present Congress, though elected in 1930, did not assemble until December, 1931, just five months ago. For the first time since March 4, 1919, a Democratic House of Representatives met and elected a Speaker, the Hon. JOHN NANCE GARNER, of Texas.

In the last House the Republicans had more than 100 majority. At present the Democrats have a bare majority of four—a majority so slender as to make party action uncertain and doubtful unless every Member is present.

Under the law it is the duty of the President to submit estimates for expenditures to Congress. He is head of all the departments that spend appropriations. They are headed by members of the President's Cabinet. In December the President, in his Budget message, asked Congress to appropriate for the next fiscal year $3,942,754,614. How did the Appropriations Committee of the House respond? It cut $161,455,101.56 below the President's requests. Every department was cut. Both Republicans and Democrats cooperated. The appropriations for 1933 by the House were $563,601,223.35 below appropriations for the current year.

The Senate made further cuts below the President's requests. Under the leadership of Senator MCKELLAR, Democratic member of the Appropriations Committee, 10 per cent cuts were made in the Interior, State, Labor, Commerce, and Justice Departments to the amount of $18,000,000. The Senate directed a similar cut in the Treasury and Post Office Departments, which, if made, will amount to $98,000,000. Other bills will be radically reduced. These savings and those of the House approximate $180,000,000 cut from the Budget requests of the President.

Since December the President has asked Congress to appropriate $825,000,000 additional.

Months ago Democratic leaders in the House began to plan still further economies of $200,000,000. The economy bill, after exhaustive labor, was drafted. Many items were eliminated on the floor. Action was not partisan. Democrats and Republicans were on both sides of most proposals. As finally passed, the bill carried reductions of $42,000,000, or in all $220,000,000 below the President's requests. The Democratic leadership of the House can not justly be blamed for what happened to that measure. Democratic leadership originated the move for economy. The President did not agree to some of the economy proposals. Confusion and dissension and division resulted.

The Democratic House has been in session for only five months. In five months it alone could not correct abuses which have been growing and mounting for 10 years into a mighty bureaucracy.

In the Senate a bipartisan Economy Committee has been appointed. It proposes to make still further cuts. Democrats in the Senate have voted to cut every appropriation bill. They will continue to do so.

Something has been said of lobbyists. Members of the President's Cabinet have been the chief lobbyists against cuts made by the Senate. Each Cabinet officer who has appeared has protested against cuts in his department.

Every group and interest affected by reductions have also flooded Congress with propaganda. Whenever a bureau is touched by the pruning knife, Members of Congress and Senators are submerged by letters and telegrams of protest.

REMEDY FOR UNEMPLOYMENT—STATEMENT BY AUSTIN E. GRIFFITHS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have before me a statement which has been prepared after very much consideration by former Judge Austin E. Griffiths, of Seattle, Wash., who is known to be a careful student of economic problems. The statement has reference to the situation now confronting us with regard to unemployment conditions and contains suggestions made after careful thought as to what ought to be done. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON HOW TO END GENERAL UNEMPLOYMENT

BAD CONDITION

This is the third year of an economic catastrophe.
Unemployment spreads.
Family reserves are gone.
Another winter is coming.
All classes are helpless.
Confidence has departed.
Fear is dominant.
It is not poverty nor improvidence.
It is not old-time poor nor personal idleness to deal with.

It is merciless, resistless, encircling unemployment; out of work, out of position, out of a job that afflicts and decimates and rests like a curse all over the land.

Whatever its course may be it is national in effect and result.

The cure is beyond the resources and control of States and municipalities. Many will break under the burden.

The cure is national in effort, leadership, and resources.

Present measures are good, but they do not go deep enough to master the emergency.

They do not lead directly to work and everyday business.
They do not displace the fatal dole.

CURE IS WORK

Work must be substituted for the prevailing dole—a dollar in money for a dollar in work—mental and manual.

These measures do not inspire confidence in the common people—the backbone of the Nation. People in general must be able to get purchasing power before the wheels of industry will start to go round. How can they get it without wage, salary—compensation for something done?

The country is fast losing hope in leadership, faith in authority, and respect for our traditions and institutions.

Old men are idle; young men are rotting upon the streets; children are in want; business is stopping, even schools are closing.

Rental signs, falling prices, and requests for aid are as numerous as the budding leaves of spring, but without their promise.

Able and good men and women beg for work and positions for themselves and their families. The masses want work. They are powerless to get it, although useful work and potential enterprise everywhere abound.

This is not a picture of ordinary poverty, nor of a limited area of distress. A plague is sweeping, devastating our land. An angel of despair is entering our homes and hovering over our country.

The people's morale is failing.

Wholesale dole destroys our old spirit of self-reliance.

Men who formerly asked for work now take dole willingly—indifferent whether they get work or relief.

Unemployment saps character. It breeds rankling discontent. Communists, public enemies, thrive upon it like pestiferous flies.

The country drifts toward demands for drastic, irresponsible change.

This nation-wide pestilence, panic, or depression, so called, must be adequately handled under Federal leadership and direction.

URGENCY

This is imperative to be done before business prostration becomes worse; before social unrest and protest breaks out; before more political strain or political insolvency sets in. Empty stomachs yield only to force.

PUBLIC WORKS

The primary cure is an adequate program of immediate public work.

Combine, correlate, supplement as far as possible national, State, and municipal useful works. Plan and do public work and enterprises, that everybody knows ought to be done sooner or later, and which, when done, will pay for themselves in valuable use.

A person who has traveled over the United States knows the need of such works. There is no limit to their number nor to their usefulness when once done.

The time is ripe to propose such action. States and localities are now sensing the gravity of the crisis. Bond issues for work payment are now proposed instead of dole or hit-and-miss relief.

NATIONAL LEADERSHIP

Let the President call at once, before Congress adjourns, a conference of State, municipal, and Federal official representatives. Let such conference adopt and recommend a program of needed and permanently useful public works and enterprises deemed sufficient under the circumstances for each State.

Let the share of each big city and State be ascertained or approximated and later be authorized and payment provided.

Let the Federal Government authorize up to $5,000,000,000 for its own work and projects.

This country is so great, so inherently sound in latent spirit and undoubted growth, that such a program could not be inflation. It could sustain a period of justified development, urban, rural, commercial, industrial, agricultural.

For example, one sees miles and miles of farm to market or lateral roads that ought to be graveled—not left in mud, dust, and racking ruts; miles and miles of highways that ought to be paved, and stretches of country without main or strategic highways.

Rivers could be improved for navigation. Big bridges and tunnels could be built; canals made. Power and irrigation could be provided and waste lands reclaimed.

Transportation and distribution facilities and instrumentalities are needed to cut cost between producer and customer.

PAYMENT

Let the Federal Government pay its amount for this purpose in promise to pay paper of convenient denominations. This paper or series to be receivable at par for all Federal services, taxes, charges, demands, or requirements. When once received back, then to be canceled.

This would not be fiat money but value for value. Example: When I was a boy on the farm the farmers of necessity swapped work, or a colt, or horse, or what not, for work or other thing of value or use. Here if A builds for the Government a useful building, bridge, or tunnel, and does an honest job, he receives payment for its fair cost in a million dollars of paper promise. Later, from time to time, in little or big amounts, the Government takes it back as lawful payment for a million dollars of governmental service or demands.

This governmental service or its requirements must be assumed to be useful and fair. Here is worth for worth, value for value. Or let the Federal Government pay its amount in long or short time serial or other type of bonds, delivered in direct payment of such work or pay, from the proceeds of their sale. Interest, if any, not to exceed 2 per cent. Such bonds to be legal tender for all debts and claims—public and private.

Such paper or money is not fiat paper or money, nor inflation.

It would represent honest pay for useful work. Again, when these bonds come back they are to be canceled.

The Government may coin money and regulate the value of money. Better than that is provision for work and service payment. Or let the Government finance such a works program as occasion requires, when its obligations therefor fall due.

The main and central purpose is useful work and satisfactory payment.

Also, no doubt, many undertakings when finished would be self-paying or return their cost in tolls or otherwise.

OBJECTIONS

Bankers and financiers may object. They should be considered but not heeded. They are not masters of any fiscal situation. Bankers have had their way. They know no more of the future, and can see no farther into a millstone than other people.

This is not a bankers' problem. It is the solution of our people's emergency and tragic condition. It is too big and pressing for bankers' control, check, or delay.

Congress no doubt would grant the necessary authority.

EFFECT OF PROGRAM

The instant effect of this program to revitalize the country would drive out fear. Confidence would come back. The effect even before it got started would be dynamic to uplift everyday business. Everyday business of Tom, Dick, and Harry is the life of a nation's trade and commerce.

The ramifications of such a program, carried out under Federal organization and direction, would quickly revive and put new blood into the heart of trade and enterprise.

The foregoing outline merely capitalizes our energy, skill, foresight; our faith in the stability and growth of our country, and places them in immediate productive use.

POLITICAL PROBLEMS AND CONDITIONS—ADDRESS BY GOVERNOR DERN, OF UTAH

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. George H. Dern, Governor of the State of Utah, at a Democratic victory campaign dinner at Helena, Mont., January 14, 1932. In the address Governor Dern discusses present political conditions, the record of the Republican Party, and the principles and policies of the Democratic Party.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For nearly 40 years the Republican Party has kept itself in power through a dishonest and untruthful campaign of misrepresenting the Democratic Party as the party of hard times. I find it hard to give any of the intelligent leaders of the Grand Old Party credit for sincerity in that propaganda. To do so is to impugn their intelligence.

They knew, as we knew, that the panic of 1893 came at the close of a Republican administration, and that President Cleveland simply inherited a condition that was built up during his Republican predecessor's term. They knew, as we knew, that the panic broke before the Cleveland administration had done anything that could have changed or affected the situation. And yet, on the contemptible theory that everything is fair in politics, they put all the blame upon the Democratic Party and by means of a great campaign fund made the people of the United States believe their deliberate misrepresentations.

They knew, as we knew, that the disastrous panic of 1907 occurred during the Republican administration of Theodore Roosevelt, and yet they kept right on preaching that the Republican Party was the party of the full dinner pail.

The Democratic Party was forced to bear these taunts and slanders and on account of them to go down to defeat after defeat, but the Republican chickens came home to roost and during the present Republican administration has come a financial typhoon compared with which the panic of 1893 was a summer zephyr. The Democratic Party has been vindicated and Republican hypocrisy has been exposed.

With the Republican Party in complete control of the country, and with Republican policies in full sway, we are in the throes of the worst panic in the history of the United States. There is more unemployment, more hunger, more suffering than this country has ever seen before. Prices of farm products are lower than at any time since the Civil War, and prices of silver, copper, and zinc are the lowest in the history of the world. Merchants have been going into bankruptcy, banks have been failing right and left, and millions of people have had their life's savings wiped out. Never have the American people been so overwhelmed by unhappiness and despair. All this during the reign of the G. O. P.—Great On Promises, not Good On Performance.

It is easy to picture what our Republican friends would be doing now if this national catastrophe had happened during a Democratic administration. If the Democrats had been successful in the last election, and if this panic had come in spite of Democratic control, can't you see the fun the Republicans would be having, gloating over Democratic "incompetency and Democratic blundering"? The same unctious Republican orators would be filling the air with their denunciation and vituperation. And I have no doubt that it would have been so effective that the Democratic Party would by this time have been greatly demoralized.

I regard it as a remarkable exhibition of forbearance that our party, now that the tables have been turned, and that the Republican Party is the party of panic and poverty, has been so meek and gentle with our former traducers. We have been careful not to rock the boat or do anything that might hinder economic recovery. Instead of retaliating as we had a right to retaliate, we have remained silent and have let the facts speak for themselves. God knows the facts are more eloquent than anything we could say. Every man, woman, and child in the United States has been hurt by the collapse of Republican policies, and now sees that the Republican pretense of being the party of prosperity is a hollow mockery.

Abraham Lincoln said: "You can fool some of the people all of the time, and all of the people some of the time, but you can not fool all of the people all of the time." The people of America have awakened to the fact that they have been fooled and betrayed by the colossal stupidity and ineptitude of their smug Republican leaders, and what they will do to the G. O. P. next November—well, just wait and see.

In 1916 the Republicans carried only two States—Vermont and Utah. I can not answer for Vermont, but I can assure you that they stand no show in Utah in this year of our Lord 1932. And inasmuch as a Democratic Congressman was elected in New Hampshire the other day, I have more than a premonition that Vermont will also redeem herself.

The American voter will this year begin to realize that by means of the Republican appeal to party loyalty he has been led like a lamb to the slaughter. The signs of the times are that the people are going to do their own thinking instead of letting selfish politicians do their thinking for them. They are going to see how ridiculous it is to believe it is an unforgivable sin for a Republican to vote for a Democrat under any circumstances.

I do not know of a single honest student of political science who has not denounced that sort of unreasoning and unreasonable partisanship as one of the most dangerous things in our American life. Intelligent voters abandoned that doctrine years and years ago. Their eyes were opened, and they saw that this party-loyalty cry is nothing more nor less than the specious plea of the unscrupulous politician who wants to retain his unholy power. Theodore Roosevelt, the greatest Republican since Lincoln, refused to be bound by any such absurd conception of party loyalty. When the Republican Party fell into a control which he could not approve, he repudiated and abandoned it. Woodrow Wilson's creed on this subject was expressed by him at Indianapolis, January 8, 1915, as follows:

"My friends, what I particularly want you to observe is this: That politics in this country does not depend any longer upon the regular members of either party. There are not enough regular Republicans in this country to take and hold national power; and I must immediately add that there are not enough regular Democrats in this country to do it either. This country is guided and its policy is determined by the independent voter—I am not an independent voter, but I hope I can claim to be an independent person, and I want to say this distinctly: I do not love my party any longer than it continues to serve the immediate and pressing needs of America. I have been bred in the Democratic Party; I love the Democratic Party; but I love America a great deal more than I love the Democratic Party; and when the Democratic Party thinks that it is an end in itself, then I rise up in dissent. It is a means to an end, and its power depends, and ought to depend, upon its showing that it knows what America needs and is ready to give it what it needs."

If the crooked or stupid politicians, by broken promises, by trades, by purchased delegates, and by promises of future favors, can control nominations, and then, on the plea of party loyalty, can induce decent citizens to vote for the candidates so nominated, how are the people ever going to throw off the yoke of machine corruption?

There is only one way in which the people can keep their parties pure, and that is by repudiating them and their works when they fall into evil ways. Parents punish their children when they do wrong in order to keep them in the right way. Why should a political party be immune from similar correction when it has gone astray? What is there so sacred about a political party? It is only an instrument contrived by man to carry out his own wishes, and it ought to be his servant. When it no longer reflects his ideals, and when it seeks to become his master rather than his servant, then it is not only his privilege but his duty to leave it, at least until it again becomes the mirror of his own opinions.

It is fine to be loyal to your party if your party is loyal to you. If it stands for your ideals, for your principles, for your conceptions of honor, decency, and righteousness, and if its nominees are the best-equipped men for the respective offices, you ought to be loyal to it and support its entire ticket, because it meets the ends of good government. But if you know that control of the party has fallen into evil hands, or if it comes out for policies which you do not approve, or if you despise its candidates and their methods, you certainly can not serve the objective of good government by party loyalty.

If a man whom I knew to be corrupt managed by some hook or crook to get on the ticket of my party, would I be any less a loyal party member if I refused to vote for him? Certainly not. Party loyalty is a wicked and dishonorable thing when it asks me to connive at dishonesty or wink at corruption and inefficiency. Indeed, if I have knowledge of any such thing and silently support it, I become an accessory to the offense.

And besides, it is not manly to take dictation from a machine. Why should any American citizen put his brains in cold storage and vote for whatever the machine hands him? What did God give us brains for if not to use them? This idea of knuckling down to some self-constituted authority and humbly doing whatever somebody tells us to do is just the same thing as recognizing the divine right of kings. The proudest boast of every true American must be that he is his own master, and that he will take dictation from nobody on earth. That sort of self-reliance, that sort of willingness to trust one's own judgment, that sort of a refusal to be anybody's slave is what is needed to build up a strong citizenry; and we can not have a great country or a great State unless we have that sort of a citizenry.

And so I think one of the burning issues of this coming campaign is whether the people shall vote their honest opinion, or whether they shall be bullied or cajoled into voting for men and measures that they disapprove in their hearts.

Party ties are not as binding in the United States as they used to be, and Republican pleas for party loyalty will fall on deaf ears when they reach the 7,000,000 workingmen who are walking the streets vainly seeking the means to support their starving families. Republican pleas for party loyalty will fall on deaf ears when they reach the farmer who can not get enough for his crops to pay his taxes and the interest on his mortgage. Republican pleas for party loyalty will fall on deaf ears when they reach the merchant and the manufacturer who are facing bankruptcy and the loss of a life's planning and working.

Already the Republican alibi is at hand. We are gravely told that the depression is not due to the Republican Party nor to Republican policies, but to a world condition over which they had no control and for which they can not be held responsible. They are trying to fool the people again.

It is an immutable law of the universe that for every effect there is a cause. Nothing just merely happens. There is a cause for everything, and there is a cause for the panic of 1929 and the hard times which have been dealing misery to the American people ever since. It is childish in apologists for the present administration to try to lull the outraged voters of this country to sleep by telling them that this depression is due to a world condition and that the Republican Party can not be blamed for it. That kind of soothing sirup is not going to quiet the millions of workers who are already beginning to ask, "What is the matter with our American system anyway? Is it all wrong, and have we got to try something else?" That spirit of revolutionary unrest and resentment is the greatest danger in the United States to-day, and it is time we were sitting up and taking notice.

Of course, the alert voter, when he is told that a world condition is responsible for his troubles is going to ask, "Well, who is responsible for that world condition?" and it is a proper and sensible question that must be answered. It is my deliberate judgment that when it is honestly and correctly answered we shall find that the chaos which now prevails throughout the world has been caused in no small measure by the blundering policies of the Republican Party of the United States of America. They blame the war, but we blame the Republicans for their unenlightened course since the war.

I said a moment ago that it is an immutable law of nature that there is cause for every effect. There is another immutable law which we all learned at school, namely, that reaction is equal to action and in the opposite direction. There is no use trying to get away from that fixed principle. What has it to do with the depression? Just this: So long as we have booms we must have depressions.

The present depression is the natural and inevitable reaction from a crazy speculative boom, which was born and nurtured during the administration and with the encouragement of that "wise and silent man," Calvin Coolidge, and which grew and finally collapsed during the tragic administration of his successor.

Wisdom and silence do not necessarily go together. President Coolidge was wise because he did not choose to run in 1928, but he was not wise in keeping silent and letting a boom develop which was bound to bring disaster and sorrow to his trusting countrymen. Indeed, he encouraged the boom instead of keeping silent about it.

I accuse the Republican Party of responsibility for the panic and the depression because it made no attempt to check the frenzied orgy of stock speculation with the train of evils resulting therefrom. On the contrary, President Coolidge, Secretary Mellon, and Secretary Hoover from time to time issued statements to the effect that there was nothing unsound in the situation, that prices were not too high, that it was a natural expansion of business, and that we were in a new economic era. Mr. Hoover said poverty had just about been abolished and that in a short time it would be a thing of the past. This sort of optimism coming from the head of the Government attracted thousands of small speculators into the market only to be fleeced when the day of reckoning came, as it was bound to come, and as conservative bankers predicted that it would come.

I can hear Republican apologists lamely asking now, "How were we to know that it was only a speculative boom rather than a period of healthy prosperity?" The obvious answer is that those who have not wisdom enough to tell dizzy speculation from sound business have not wisdom enough to be entrusted with the destinies of 120,000,000 people.

I accuse the Republican Party to-day of not having a program or a single constructive idea for preventing a recurrence of this depression a few years hence. The best that the Hoover administration has to offer is a few palliative measures to go into effect after most of us have gone broke. That and a lot of fine talk about rugged individualism.

What good is rugged individualism to the working man out of a job whose wife and children are hungry, ragged, and cold?

What good is rugged individualism to the farmer whose mortgage has been foreclosed?

What good is rugged individualism to the States which are now paying for the National Government's mistakes? Surely the State of Montana is not responsible for the misery which her people are now suffering. State policies and State actions did not bring on the hard times, and yet the burden is being thrown back upon the States to feed and clothe their citizens who have been made destitute by blunders at Washington.

One shudders at the folly of the administration in starting a program of retrenchment in Government expenditures at this time. It is more important, it seems, to balance the Budget than to relieve the distress of honest American citizens who are ready, willing, and anxious to work but who can find no jobs. It is more important, it seems, to keep down taxes than to make work for the unemployed. Just think of the heartless cruelty of the Federal Government laying off men in an emergency when it ought to make every effort to put more men to work!

The country should be declared in a state of war, not against a foreign foe but against a more dangerous and more destructive domestic foe, named unemployment. Do you remember the war taxes, the Liberty-loan drives, and the Red Cross drives? Do you remember how eager the people were to lay their lives and their fortunes upon the altar of their country? We need that sort of a spirit to-day, but we can not have it without the right kind of leadership at Washington.

I have no doubt that we shall muddle through this mess of bankruptcy and ruin, and that times will get better after a while, although there will be millions who will never get back to the economic security which they enjoyed before the crash came. But in the approaching election the people of the United States are going to look for a new program so that it shall not happen again. They can not get such a program from the Republican Party, for that party is just tinkering up the old machine so that it will run a while and then break down again.

Woodrow Wilson once said the Republican Party had not had a new idea for 40 years. Many people thought he was trying to be facetious when he made that remark; but what he said was literally true. The Republicans have only one cure for everything, and that is to raise the tariff.

For many years the Democratic Party stood for a tariff for revenue only and opposed a solely protective tariff. With the passing decades, however, the country has worked under the protective system until the United States has become thoroughly industrialized, and a revenue tariff no longer fits the situation. The Democratic Party, being a progressive party with its eyes on the future rather than on the past, has therefore changed its attitude to fit the changed conditions, and its tariff policy to-day has four objectives. The first is to provide revenue for the general Government. The second is to equalize the cost of production at home and abroad, to the end that American industries shall not be destroyed by foreign industries which have lower costs. The third is to maintain American wages and the American standard of living. The fourth is to safeguard American agriculture, which has been neglected and almost destroyed by Republican tariff policies.

I accuse the Republican Party of having violated these sound and fair tariff principles and of bringing woe to the American people by so doing.

The Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act is designed to keep out entirely any products that are also manufactured in the United States. It is no longer a competitive tariff but approaches a prohibitive tariff.

The first effect of a prohibitive tariff is to prohibit other countries from buying our surplus products, because they can not exchange their goods for ours. When we sell goods in foreign nations we must take our pay either in gold or in goods. We can not sell to Europe for gold, because Europe, except France, has no gold; and even if it had, and if it made large purchases from us for gold, we should soon have all the gold in the world, and that would be the end of the business. If we will not take our pay in goods other nations can not buy from us at all, and our foreign trade is gone.

President McKinley was the great apostle of protection in his day. In his last speech, which was delivered at Buffalo shortly before he was assassinated, he said a nation can not always sell without buying, and so he advocated reciprocity. His advice was wise and economically sound but was never followed by his party, which has finally enacted a tariff schedule so high that it has practically strangled our foreign trade.

The second effect of a prohibitive tariff is the destruction of international good will. The Smoot-Hawley bill has aroused hatred and bitterness against the United States the world over, because it has destroyed industries in other countries and thrown great numbers of people out of employment. The consequence is that retaliatory tariffs have been erected against us to keep out our goods, and thus our foreign market has been further damaged, and more American workmen have lost their jobs.

The third effect of a prohibitive tariff is to drive our own industries out of the United States into foreign countries, where they employ foreign labor instead of American labor. The retaliatory tariff walls that have been erected against us by foreign nations on account of the Smoot-Hawley bill have made it impossible for our manufacturers to ship their products into those countries. Our enterprising industrialists have therefore gone into those countries, built factories there, employed foreign labor, and manufactured the goods which used to be manufactured in the United States by American labor. I am informed that already 2,000 such American manufacturing plants have been erected in Canada and Europe. Thus has a prohibitive tariff thrown many thousands of American workmen out of employment, thereby contributing to the depression. And yet the Republican Party poses as the friend of the working man.

The fourth effect of a prohibitive tariff is that it lowers our standard of living, because it lowers the purchasing power of our goods. This is so because the surplus products which we formerly sold abroad are now thrown back upon the home market and break down prices. We can maintain home prices only so long as we can get rid of our surpluses.

The fifth effect of a prohibitive tariff is that it has crucified American agriculture. Our farmers raise large surpluses of the staple crops, such as wheat, cotton, and meats, and these surpluses must find a foreign outlet. Foreign nations can not buy our farm products for cash because they have no gold. The only way they can buy them is to trade some of their goods for our wheat, cotton, beef, mutton, or pork. But we have a tariff wall to keep out their goods, so we make it physically impossible for them to buy our farm and livestock products, and our agriculture languishes. Moreover, the same tariff wall which keeps down the price of what the farmer has to sell keeps up the price of what he has to buy. The farmer has been the victim of this tariff game. He has been catching it coming and going. He has been bled white in order to protect the manufacturing industries, many of which were unwisely established. And yet, having once been established, none of us wants to see them destroyed.

The Republicans are trying to fool the farmer into believing that his troubles are due to the depression. If he will use his memory, he will know that he was "deflated" as soon as the war was over. That is to say, the prices of his products dropped immediately after the war, which means that his wages were cut. All other wages remained up, and hence the price of everything he had to buy remained up. This unbalanced condition has made farming an unprofitable business long before the present general depression commenced. Let the farmer beware of the wiles of political quacks who try to make him believe that he will be all right when the depression is over. He has a depression all his own, which was not caused by the panic, and which requires special treatment.

In the presidential campaign of 1928, more than a year before there was any significant sign of a panic or a depression, farm relief was one of the live issues, and the Republican Party solemnly promised to cure the ills of the farmer, and to put him on an equality with those engaged in other industries. After it had won the election, the Republican Party had to make a pretense of redeeming its promise to relieve the farmer and it enacted the Federal farm marketing act. This measure was economically unsound, and everybody who had any knowledge of economics knew that it could not work. It has probably done the farmer a great deal more harm than good. It has cost the taxpayers of the United States $500,000,000 and, as John W. Davis said the other day, all it has accomplished is that "it has convinced the American farmer that once more he has been handed a gold brick of purest brass serene."

I wonder if the American farmer is going to keep right on committing suicide by voting the Republican ticket, but I have too much faith in his intelligence and common sense to think he will be so unwise.

There is a sixth effect of a prohibitive tariff that must not be overlooked. I can state it this way: The war debts were canceled by the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley bill.

We say to our debtors, "You owe us large sums of money which you borrowed from us, and we want you to pay it back. We will not accept your goods in payment, for we do not want to destroy our industries and throw our people out of employment. We want our pay in gold. To be sure, you have no gold, and you can not get any, for we and France have it all. Now pay your debts!"

It is just as silly as that, and it is highly amusing to see Republican Senators and Representatives swearing they will never consent to debt reduction or cancellation and at the same time voting for higher and ever higher tariffs. Congress may rave as much as it pleases, but so long as the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill remains a law the war debts are as dead as slavery.

We must not lose sight of the fact that before the war the United States was a debtor Nation. We paid our debts and interest charges chiefly with our surplus agricultural products, and thus had a good market for those products, so that our farmers prospered. But we came out of the war a creditor Nation, and we no longer have debts and interest to pay, and hence that market for our farm products no longer exists. We must find some other way to unload our surpluses, and probably this will call for a changed tariff policy if we want to keep American agriculture alive.

The whole tariff question has become tremendously complex, and should be approached cautiously and scientifically. I like the suggestion that the rates should be reduced gradually and on a reciprocal basis.

I accuse the Republican administration, in the present crisis, of adhering to a financial policy and program that is disastrous to every American debtor and producer.

The United States Senate, mindful of the shrinkage in our oriental trade and of the reasons therefor, passed a resolution advising the President to call an international silver conference. The President has failed to act, and nothing has been done.

The President has also let it be known that the United States is determined to stay on the gold standard. The people of the United States should awaken to the fact that their greatest problem to-day is the money problem. They have made a sacred cow out of the gold standard and are blind to the iniquitous effects of that system.

The situation was clearly set forth in a resolution adopted by the American Farm Bureau Federation last month, which reads as follows:

"The present period of depression and the falling price level has increased the burden of taxes, interest, debts, and other fixed costs on all producers to an intolerable degree. It now requires 45 per cent more of all commodities and 70 per cent more of farm commodities to pay these costs than it did a few years ago. The long-continued deflation is crushing farmers, merchants, transportation agencies, and all manufacturers except a few most favorably situated, and has caused a declining price of property to such an extent that it has largely eliminated equities and is affecting basic securities to such an extent as to seriously impair the stability of our banking and insurance institutions, thereby endangering the welfare of the general public. It is causing a lowering of all wages and salaries, a process which has only started and which must of necessity lower the standard of living if continued.

"The principal cause of this deflation of values is monetary. When the price of any one commodity falls many causes may be responsible. When the average price level of all commodities fall with the rapidity of the last few years the principal cause is a shortage of money and credit in actual use. Commodity prices are expressed in this country in terms of dollars. Every purchase and sale is the exchange of commodities for dollars. When dollars are scarce it takes a larger amount of commodities to get them. In other words, money is at one end of the balance, commodities at the other. Add to the effective supply of money and prices go up. Reduce the effective supply and prices come down. The above statements are justified and supported by the incontrovertible evidence coming from the experience of all former depressions. The problem divides itself into two parts—first, the restoration of the price level, and, second, the stabilization of the purchasing power of money."

Let me restate and amplify the argument in my own words.

We are in the habit of complaining about low commodity prices. It is true that all commodity prices have gone down in terms of money and we jump at the conclusion that it is due to overproduction. But I call attention to the fact that not merely a few commodities have gone down but every one of them has gone down. I also call attention to the fact that they have all gone down in about the same proportion. Is anyone so simple as to believe that there was the same degree of overproduction in each and every one of them? It would be silly to make such an assertion.

When we examine commodity prices in terms of each other instead of in terms of money, we find that they have not fluctuated violently. A bale of cotton will buy about as many pounds of copper as it would when the price level was higher, and so on all through the list of commodities. It is only when we measure them in terms of gold that they have gone down. A gold dollar now will buy two or three times as much wheat or cotton or lumber or oranges or copper or lead as it would buy two years ago. What does that mean? It simply means that the value of gold has gone up and is now at an enormous premium.

There is a considerable degree of misapprehension about the function of gold as money. A common fallacy is that gold is nothing but a measure of values, and that it really does not make any difference whether the measuring stick be made of gold or of wood so long as it correctly measures the relative values of goods. As a matter of fact, however, by making obligations payable in gold we have made gold subject to the law of supply and demand, the same as any other commodity. When gold is scarce, as it is now, with most of the world's supply locked up in the United States and France, or hoarded in socks, mattresses, and safe-deposit boxes, and with credits practically withdrawn, its value goes up. We are on the gold standard, and all our dollars are gold dollars. These gold dollars are hard to get, and the producer who needs dollars to pay his debts and taxes has to let go of two or three times as much of his product as he did when gold was at par, so to speak.

The depression which has paralyzed the world is due to an increase in the real value of gold, measured by its purchasing power. If it takes two or three bushels of wheat to buy a gold dollar where formerly it took only one, has not the farmer been adversely affected by the advance in the real value of gold? Many wage reductions have been put into effect in the United States, which simply means that the working man must now give more of his labor for a dollar than he gave before.

The trouble is that our gold dollar is a very unstable dollar. First it goes up and then it goes down. When it goes up, God help the poor fellow who owes debts or taxes, for those debts and taxes are all payable in the same old gold dollar, and he must get that gold dollar, no matter what he has to pay for it. He must sacrifice his crops, or his manufactured products, or his stocks and bonds, or his real estate for whatever they will bring in order to get the gold dollars with which to pay his obligations. And of course the man who collects the debt is collecting more real value than the debtor contracted to pay, for the dollar which the creditor receives will buy twice as much produce, or manufactured goods, or stocks and bonds, or real estate as he expected. Pretty soft for him, as the schoolboys would say, provided he can collect. But if the debtor is unable to pay, the creditor loses too, unless he takes over the collateral and holds it until its price goes up again.

That is what is the matter with the debtor and taxpayer, which means all of us. If he is to have relief and a square deal he must get gold back down where it belongs. He must have a stable money so that when his debts and taxes fall due he will have to pay what he promised to pay, and no more.

Is it not a pity that we have apparently committed ourselves to a policy that is breaking every debtor in the country? Why should our Government be so solicitous of the interests of the creditors and so careless of the debtors? The dollar has become too dear. It must be cheapened, or we will all go to smash.

There are several ways to cheapen the dollar. We might go off the gold standard entirely, as most of the world has already done; we might reduce the gold content of the dollar; or we might make a larger use of silver as money. Every consideration seems to favor the third alternative, namely, making a larger use of silver as money.

Money is a commodity, and the more money we have the cheaper it is and the higher prices are. We need to inflate our currency within safe limits in order to restore the price level. If the price level is not restored, wage reductions are inevitable, for business can not be indefinitely conducted at a loss. And wage reductions mean a lower standard of living.

One of the economic follies of the Hoover administration has been its vain insistence upon maintaing wages in the face of the paralyzing effect of falling prices. That simply can not be done very long, for business can not operate indefinitely at a loss. If Mr. Hoover wants to maintain wages, as we all do, he must devise some way to maintain prices. The way to maintain prices is to increase purchasing power, and the way to increase purchasing power is to put more money into circulation, which is usually called inflation.

Purchasing power means money, whether in the form of coin, bank notes, or bank credits. If a bank makes a loan and places the amount to the credit of the customer, so that he may check against it, the result is just the same as if he had so much gold in his pocket. Bank credits ordinarily form a large part of the country's money, but there must be a gold reserve behind bank credits. In a panicky time like this, when confidence is gone and depositors are nervous, one can hardly get a loan at a bank even on Liberty bonds, and hence the form of money represented by bank credits has shriveled up, or deflated. Gold alone is not plentiful enough to do the Nation's business. We need more money.

The best way to inflate the currency within safe limits is to enlarge the use of silver. There should be an international conference of competent experts to study the whole subject and to agree upon a program that will be fair to all and economically sound. I have no doubt that such a conference could devise means to restore silver at least to its pre-war status, to the great profit of all mankind.

I should like to say more about silver, but this is a political speech, and we want to keep the silver question out of politics. I mention the money question only to emphasize its importance and to show how necessary it is to consider it in a spirit of justice between man and man. I maintain that the single gold standard has proved monstrously unjust, and it certainly is not the last word in finance.

I accuse the Republican Party of large responsibility for the world depression through its foolish policy of national or economic isolation.

I am aware that there are a lot of timid souls in the United States who have an inferiority complex, and who are afraid to have our great country take its rightful place in world leadership. They say we ought to stay at home and mind our own business. That sounds fine, and I am in favor of it, in so far as our business is at home. But if we have business away from home I am in favor of minding that, too. The prudent and successful business man minds all of his business, for if he neglects part of it the whole concern may go to pieces.

And, of course, we have business away from home. Without foreign trade we can not prosper and foreign trade creates all sorts of international relations. It is sheer nonsense to say we ought to stay at home and mind our own business. We are in the world. We are part of the world, and we can not avoid participating in its affairs, any more than a decent citizen of Helena can stay in his own house and avoid participating in the affairs of his city.

The trouble is that we have been staying at home and minding our own business too much, and now look at the fix we are in. Senator CORDELL HULL claims that it has already cost the United States $25,000,000,000 to find out that economic isolation is impossible.

Our Government owes it to its people to follow the policy laid down in Jefferson's first inaugural address: "Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none." We may take our place as a world leader and cooperate with the rest of the world for the common welfare without getting into entangling alliances. And for our own prosperity and economic well-being we absolutely need and must have commerce and honest friendship with all nations.

I have confidence in American brains and American ability, and I believe our representatives can hold their own in any company. It makes me angry when some wise cracker says we have won every war and lost every conference we ever got into, and I despise the counsel of cowardice which tells us we are too dumb to confer with other countries.

The Republican Party says we are suffering from a world depression, and that we are on the rocks because the whole world is on the rocks. Well, what is the Republican Party doing about it? Is it taking any steps to get the world off the rocks? Not so you can notice it. As Nicholas Murray Butler said recently, we are just a magnificent Micawber, waiting for something to turn up. We are staying at home and minding our own business. Why should we be so timid when timidity has proved so costly? Why shouldn't we bravely and manfully assume the position of world leadership, and work for a higher civilization that shall extend to the uttermost ends of the earth?

If we could simply raise the rest of the world to our own standard of living there is business enough in sight to keep us prosperous for 200 years. But we are shutting our eyes to our great opportunities. Instead of helping other nations to rise we seem to swat them whenever we can so as to keep them down, on the theory that we can get rich by keeping other nations poor. We are making ourselves ridiculous by building a fence around the United States and trying to live within that fence.

I have already taken too much time in discussing a few of the problems that are crying for solution, and that have helped bring on and prolong the depression. Surely I have said enough to show how dismally the Republican Party has failed. It has bankrupted most of the people of the United States, and no wonder, for it is bankrupt itself. It is bankrupt of leadership, bankrupt of ideas, bankrupt of human sympathy, and almost bankrupt of members.

Members of the administration are already taking to the lifeboats. Obviously the Republican administration to-day is a sinking ship. Charles G. Dawes has announced that he is going to resign as ambassador to Great Britain and go back into the banking business at Chicago. Was he dissatisfied with the administration's bungling foreign policy and its lack of candor with the American people in regard to the war debts?

Vice President Curtis has just about announced that he did not choose to run in 1932; was he convinced that his refusal to be a candidate would be regarded as a repudiation of his party's record, just as failure to renominate Mr. Hoover would be a confession of Republican failure, and that it was his duty to sacrifice himself?

The Republican Party is a heterogeneous crowd, and nobody knows what it stands for, or where it is going. It has in its ranks both reactionaries and progressives, but the reactionaries are always in control.

The Democratic Party in both Houses of Congress is giving a fine example of unity of purpose and of sober realization of its responsibilities. It is considering the problems before it with a sympathetic, progressive viewpoint and a patriotic desire to bring back business stability and economic order; to give all of our people a satsfactory income from honest labor, and to restore to them the right and opportunity to earn a living; to let every section of the country enjoy the fruits of its labor, so that no large group shall live at the expense of another group; and to win for America again the position of world leadership, respect, and affection which she had attained under the inspiration, the vision, the justice, the courage, and the moral purpose of her great idealistic war President, Woodrow Wilson.

Victory in the coming election is certain. Although the Democratic Party was overwhelmed in 1928, the people are calling it back to power, to lead them out of the wilderness. We should all be sobered by the magnitude and the responsibility of the task that is about to be placed in our hands. But with a firm resolution to do the right as God gives us to see the right, we go forward to victory and to our country's service confident and unafraid.

SALE OF COTTON AND WHEAT FOR SILVER

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I have a letter from the distinguished member of the State Senate of Texas, Senator J. W. Stevenson, which I request may be printed in the RECORD, together with a short excerpt from an article accompanying the letter.

There being no objection, the letter and excerpt were ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SENATE OF THE STATE OF TEXAS,
Austin, May 10, 1932.

Senator TOM CONNALLY,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I want to submit a proposition that I think will help in this financial depression, although not effect a complete cure. That is that surplus cotton and wheat be sold abroad for silver, the silver bars to be deposited in the United States Treasury and silver certificates, made legal tender, issued against them. This system prevailed for many years before the seventies; in fact, silver was money from the days before Christ till 1873.

I am not arguing for free and unlimited coinage of silver nor on a basis of 16 to 1. These are subjects for the Congress to determine under our laws. I believe there should be some limit on the coinage of silver and a ratio—not 16 to 1, but more nearly in accordance with values. Not being an economist, I will make no suggestions along these lines, but you can have the work done in a week and pass the bill in 10 days.

I notice Senator BORAH advocates an international Congress to standardize silver. I fear the Senator is fixing things for another of "them things" at Geneva, which I abhor. The United States can standardize silver at a ratio for surplus wheat and cotton without losing anything, for the surplusage is practically a dead loss anyway. Then perhaps other nations will drop in and agree just once with this country.

I have in mind that the peoples who are hungry and naked are India and China. And these are the two peoples having quantities of silver in hoarding. Give them a chance and the trade is on, perhaps through Liverpool and Lancaster, perhaps New York, and perhaps directly. Exchange does not mean the direct trading of money. A Shanghai merchant may deposit silver in his bank for the credit of its New York correspondent, and the New York correspondent will make shipment at once. The adjustment of money in the transaction may go through a dozen banks.

But bear in mind that the silver shall be used only for the purchase of surplus cotton and wheat in the United States. Get these two products going and the wheels of commerce will commence going round again; and while we may not have the inflation of 1928, we will get out of the depression of 1932. Later on other products may come into the plan, and it will be our Congress, not an international talkfest, that will start things going.

I submit these propositions with some humility, because I do not pretend to be a financial expert. Yet if you will read the inclosure you will find that when I was deputy comptroller of New York City I designed a sinking-fund plan that cured a defect in the finances of the city that was approved by the elder J. P. Morgan; Seth Low, then mayor of the city; and by practically every bank president of the city. The plan, let me add, was successful in every respect.

Yours very sincerely,

J. W. STEVENSON,
Victoria, Tex.

JAMES W. STEVENSON, FORMERLY COMMISSIONER OF BRIDGES, NEW YORK CITY

When Mr. Stevenson was appointed deputy comptroller the legal technicalities affecting the sinking fund of the city produced an unnecessary accumulation which in the life of that fund would exceed $300,000,000. He prepared a bill which corrected these conditions and remedial legislation was secured with the result that the unnecessary accumulation in that fund is now used to reduce taxation. During the years 1903 to 1907 over $54,000,000 of surplus revenue was used for the reduction of taxation. The taxes for each of those years was reduced by more than 10 per cent. For the next succeeding 20 years the reduction will be still greater. His work in establishing the sinking fund of the city on scientific principles was recognized as a master stroke in municipal finance and was highly commended by the papers of the entire country. His plan received the personal indorsement of the presidents of the larger banks and eminent financiers. Among others who wrote letters approving it was Mr. J. P. Morgan.

Mr. Stevenson was secretary of the board of estimate and apportionment for four years. His advice as to policy and expediency in connection with many important matters decided by that board was a potent factor in the development of many large public improvements.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I ask that the Senate carry out the unanimous-consent agreement entered into earlier in the day and take a recess until Monday at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Thereupon (at 2 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, May 16, 1932, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Blessed Heavenly Father, we praise Thee for Thy thought and teaching and for the many disclosures of divine revelation. There is no lasting worth of character only as it finds its source and ideals in the truth of the eternally righteous God. In the realm of the present-day circumstances, circled by questions and problems unprecedented, O do Thou direct us and allow us not to be dismayed. Breathe upon our purposes and ambitions. Reveal unto us the fairer uplands of the soul which are attainable. May we be keenly sensitive of our mission and our calling by our Republic, so that we shall be justified by our devoted, wise, patriotic service. In the name of Jesus, our Saviour, we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 382. Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for printing and binding for Congress for the fiscal year 1932.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to a bill and joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 4193. An act to authorize the issuance of bonds by the St. Thomas Harbor Board, Virgin Islands, for the acquisition or construction of a graving or dry dock; and

S. J. Res. 36. Joint resolution to change the name of the islands of "Porto Rico" to "Puerto Rico."

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. J. Res. 382. Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for printing and binding for Congress for the fiscal year ending 1932.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill and joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 4193. An act to authorize the issuance of bonds by the St. Thomas Harbor Board, Virgin Islands, for the acquisition or construction of a graving or dry dock; and

S. J. Res. 36. Joint resolution to change the name of the island "Porto Rico" to "Puerto Rico."

LIGHTER-THAN-AIR AIRSHIP MAIL

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have until Thursday night next to file minority views on the bill H. R. 8681, the lighter-than-air airship mail bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AMMONIUM SULPHATE

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution, as amended, from the Committee on Ways and Means, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 213

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to submit to the House of Representatives as soon as practicable all the testimony, evidence, exhibits, documents, and records presented in or pertaining to the investigation conducted by the Secretary of the Treasury under authority of the antidumping act, 1921 (U. S. C., title 19, secs. 160–173), relating to the importation of ammonium sulphate.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 1, after the word "that," insert "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER] introduced this resolution, asking for the evidence presented to the Treasury Department on an application to invoke the antidumping law in respect to the importation of sulphate of ammonium, which is now on the free list. The Treasury Department has not yet decided the case or reached a decision in the matter. Under the rules of the House, as we all know, a resolution of inquiry is privileged, and unless a report within seven days is made, a motion to discharge the committee from further consideration of the resolution is privileged. In the committee there was some opposition to the resolution. The committee adopted an amendment which they recommend to the House to accept, to the effect that the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to send the information if it is not incompatible with the public interest. Those are the facts in the case.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I shall not interpose any objection to the passage of this resolution as speedily as may be, but I do want to voice for the RECORD my opposition to the passage of a resolution of this kind, which calls for the production to the House of all the testimony, evidence, exhibits, documents, and records, matters very clearly of a confidential nature, which have come to the Treasury Department in the course of an investigation of violations of the antidumping act. In my opinion, if this shall become anything like a common practice, it will utterly destroy the possibility of the Treasury Department and of the Tariff Commission securing evidence from outside sources, because, if these matters can not be treated confidentially by the representatives of the Government who obtain this information from manufacturers, producers, and tradesmen, then, of course, we will never get the information. The committee amendment, reading "if not incompatible with the public interest," will, in my opinion, protect the Government as well as private interests in this particular case, but the House should not put a question of this kind up to the department. We have no right to expose information of this kind to either competitive or inquisitive scrutiny, after it has been obtained for the Government's own purposes with no disclosed purpose of intended publicity. Indeed, if such publicity were intended, the information would probably never be obtained. No business interest would disclose its costs of production, sales prices in different markets, and other competitive conditions, even for the use of the Federal Government, if that information is to be disclosed to the world.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CRISP, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Rules, presented the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 215

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 4743, a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment," approved June 2, 1920, as amended. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Education, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GASQUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. GASQUE. I want to talk for a few minutes upon the President's veto message on the omnibus pension bill, which I have been trying to get time to do for some time.

Mr. SNELL. If we are going to finish the Army appropriation bill to-day, it seems to me important that we should get on with that. However, I leave the matter to the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to object, but I think the gentleman ought to withdraw his request.

Mr. GASQUE. I have been trying to get time to make this short talk for two or three weeks. I have not yet called upon this House to yield me any time during this session. In view of the severity of that veto message, I think I should be given opportunity to be heard. I intend to be heard. I have been before different gentlemen who have had control of time, but I have yet been unable to get time.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is very unfortunate the gentleman was not here on Calendar Wednesday when we were killing time and looking for persons to consume time because we had no bills of importance to consider.

Mr. GASQUE. I tried my best to get time that day and did not get it.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman had applied to me, I was looking for Members like the gentleman to give time to.

Mr. GASQUE. I sought time on my own side.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is absolutely necessary that we finish this bill and get it to the Senate. Early next week there will probably be opportunities for the gentleman to get 20 minutes or more. Could the gentleman not wait until the first part of next week and accommodate us with this bill, so that we can make progress to-day?

Mr. GASQUE. The only reason I do not accede to the gentleman's request is that I have been trying to get this time for more than two weeks, and I have not been able to get it in any other way.

Mr. COLLINS. If the gentleman will withdraw it, I will help him get some time next week.

Mr. GASQUE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

THE SOLDIERS' BONUS

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY] be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and to include therewith a letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, during my 10 years in Congress I have without hesitation voted for every bill which concerned the welfare of our soldier boys who served their country in time of war. I have favored every bonus proposal, and now stand committed to the full payment of the present obligation that is due the soldiers from the Government. I have not only actively supported legislation for the benefit of the veterans, but I have handled hundreds of individual claims for the veterans of my district, and have done everything in my power to assist them in securing benefits to which they might be entitled under the law. The following letter, which I have received from Col. Edgar Bain, of Goldsboro, a prominent member of the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars, leads me to believe that the veterans of my district and State know that I always stand ready to serve them and guard their interests:

GOLDSBORO, N. C., May 9, 1932.

Hon. CHARLES L. ABERNETHY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: It is with pleasure that I wish to express to you my appreciation for the excellent service you have rendered in your district. By your untiring efforts you have served your people in every way possible, securing for them appropriations for public buildings, national parks, waterways, and the consideration you have given the individual has been marvelous.

Let me say as an ex-service man you have been more than a friend to them. You have taken their part on every occasion. You have secured for them pensions, compensation, hospitalization, and benefits for the widow and the orphan.

We are pleased that you are now on important committees that will give you still better opportunities to serve. Your 10 years' experience is a valuable asset to you and the district.

We are indeed glad that you have recovered from a severe attack of influenza and that you are steadily and surely regaining your former splendid health. Your people appreciate you, Mr. ABERNETHY, and you hear them singing your praises all over the district.

I am saying to all the buddies of the World War in this territory:

"Time has passed rapidly since the war ceased. When you were serving your country the most popular song of the day was Keep the Home Fires Burning. Many who sang it have forgotten, but I know one man who has not, and that is Hon. CHARLES L. ABERNETHY, your Congressman.

"Congressman ABERNETHY has always fought for you and served you without ceasing. When others have failed to secure benefits for you, he has succeeded. I know this to be a fact as he has assisted me in securing favors for you time and again. There are hundreds of men and women who will bear me out in this statement.

"When the adjusted compensation (so-called bonus) came up, without fear Mr. ABERNETHY came out boldly and stated that you should have your money.

"Your Congressman (ABERNETHY), friend and benefactor to the ex-service man, is a man who knows you before as well as after an election. He is no high-hatter and is one of the most appreciative persons I know, a servant of the people.

"He is going back to Congress, and you and I want to help him on his way. He is in a better position to serve you now than ever before. Why even think of a change? It is ridiculous. Another may be just as good, but how do we know? We can't take a chance on a possibility when we have a reality. Those who know me will tell you that my comrades of the war come first; and if I did not believe it was for your best interest and the district to support our man, I would say so."

Wishing you success, I am, sincerely yours,

EDGAR H. BAIN,
Ex-Captain World War.

The following editorial concerning my record in Congress appeared in the New Bern Sun-Journal of May 10, 1932:

SUPPORTING ABERNETHY

Without going into the merits of a political campaign that is past, it must be admitted that New Bern was the heavy loser when two years ago a native New Bernian was not returned to the United States Senate. Similar lines were drawn in another State, and those who are now connected with the New Bern daily newspapers living there gave their allegiance to the straight Democratic ticket. Fortunately there the decision did not require a vote against a neighbor. Two years ago Craven County cast a vote which indicated she was unwilling, despite party ties, to sacrifice representation in Congress by a New Bernian.

There is now in progress a campaign in which this city and county have at stake the position of their remaining Representative in Congress. There is little danger of his defeat, but there is the future menace of cultivating dissension and disagreement In this instance the question of political alliance is eliminated, and the local daily newspapers favor the nomination of Congressman CHARLES L. ABERNETHY to succeed himself as the Representative in Congress of the third congressional district of North Carolina.

There are at this time a number of matters being considered by the National Government which are of vital concern to this section of eastern North Carolina. Such farm aid as the National Government can give our farmers was never more needed. The waterways of eastern North Carolina are being deepened and extended, and ports are being built. With the hoped-for improvement of the farm situation, the drainage question will immediately present itself. There is need of Federal aid in conserving, extending, and developing all the natural resources of eastern North Carolina—and of the State, for that matter.

There is not the slightest doubt that Congressman ABERNETHY is of more value to this entire section at this time than any other available man could be. Experience and seniority in Congress have placed him in a position which can not be attained by any new Member of that body for years. He is in a position to accomplish now that for which this section can not wait another 10 or 14 years. Why should this district sacrifice now her carefully builded standing in Congress?

While New Bern and Craven County can and do claim Congressman ABERNETHY as their own personal representative in Washington and have that added interest in his return, even his personal and political enemies will admit that any resident of his district gets prompt and efficient action when an appeal is made to the Representative for aid. The various counties and communities and individuals in the district have that representation impartially and promptly.

It may be some time before New Bern and Craven County have another Senator, and it most assuredly will be a long time before any Senator from this city attains the rank and standing of the one who retired two years ago. It would as certainly be a long time before this city and county would place another citizen in the House of Representatives if Congressman ABERNETHY is not given their support.

As for the district, its loss would be almost equal to that of New Bern and Craven County.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11897) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11897, with Mr. LANHAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, the Clerk has not read the paragraph yet.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the amendment which the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to offer directed to the paragraph beginning at line 21 on page 12 and concluding at line 14 on page 13?

Mr. CONNERY. It is, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, that paragraph has been passed. That was read and the committee rose. It will be necessary to read another paragraph before any amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that that paragraph was read and there was no opportunity to offer amendments. The committee rose immediately after the reading of the paragraph. Under the circumstances, the Chair thinks if the gentleman from Massachusetts has a pertinent amendment it would be in order at this time.

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: Page 12, strike out all of lines 21, 22, 23, and 24; and on page 13, strike out all of lines 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, the amendment is to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, due to sickness in my family, I am obliged to leave at 3 o'clock. I wanted to take this opportunity, both on this amendment and the entire bill, to say that I am in favor of retaining the Budget provisions for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and the citizens' military training camps, and I hope that Congress will pass a bill which will give us adequate national defense.

I am in favor of all propositions to which amendments will be offered to keep our Army up to the standard, the National Guard, the citizens' military training camps, and all of the other propositions, which will give us an adequate national defense.

I have no personal interest in this particular matter to which my amendment is directed. I was a private during the war, and this applies only to officers, and there is no question of any personal issue in it at all. But I can not see the justice of saying to a man like General Glassford, who is chief of police in Washington, D. C., or a man like General Patrick, who was Chief of the Air Corps, or any of those men who are working in positions for the Government now, "Because you have got brains, because you are capable and able and do an efficient job for the United States Government in some of its departments, if you can make over $3,000 with your retirement and this pay you must be dropped from the pay roll. You must either do one or the other." I do not think that is the right kind of economy. I do not think it is efficiency. It applies not only to these men but to other men in other bureaus of the United States Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What is the gentleman's amendment, again?

Mr. CONNERY. It would strike out all of the paragraph down to line 15 on page 13.

That is the whole proposition. As I say, I do not believe it is the right kind of economy. I do not believe that because a man is efficient he should thus be penalized. Referring to General Glassford, particularly, he was commander of the Twenty-sixth Division in France, and he was the youngest general in the American Expeditionary Forces. His men were crazy about him. His men thought he was a wonderful leader. The fact that he is young and was retired from the United States Army and is now able to go into civil life outside of the United States Government and get far more pay than he is getting here should not be held against him. He loves that work. He is a soldier. He was a born soldier and likes that work. To say to him, "Your combined pay exceeds $3,000 and therefore you will have to give up one or the other," I do not think is the kind of economy that the people of the United States want.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If I remember correctly, the gentleman from Massachusetts and I have been collaborating for many years to avoid overtime and duplication and to create a spread of employment.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And here is a class of men who could retire and whose places could be taken by very worthy citizens who do not have the benefits of retirement pay.

Mr. CONNERY. That is true; but if that rule were followed to its logical, natural conclusion, men would be taken out of Congress; they would be asked to choose between their retired pay and getting out of Congress.

Mr. SNELL. Some of them will be retired, too.

Mr. CONNERY. I think this is going a little too far. The gentleman from New York says these men may be filling jobs that others not drawing retirement pay might fill, but I say we would look a long time before we found another Glassford or another Patrick for this kind of job.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I am obliged to leave, but I want to place myself on record as being in favor of retaining the provision for the citizens' military training camps, the National Guard, and all the propositions which were originally advocated by the President in the Budget message, and I hope Congress will give the country a good national defense act. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to let the House know that this amendment would strike out the provision which limits retired pay and other compensation from the Government to a total of $3,000, combined.

A provision identical to this was carried in the naval appropriation bill. The language in the naval appropriation bill is identical with the language in this bill.

In addition to that let me call the attention of the House to the situation as we know it in a few instances. General

Crosby, one of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, draws a retirement allowance of $6,000. It is my understanding that if and when General Crosby, should he be retired from the District of Columbia, or if and when General Patrick should be retired from his position with the District of Columbia, or General Glassford, in addition to the retirement pay they now receive as retired officers they also would receive retirement pay from the District of Columbia. I asked the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia that question, and he said that the law might be so interpreted, and that probabilities are they would be retired with the allowances that officers of such classifications would receive. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the provision will not affect anyone receiving less than $3,000, it seems to me the House should follow its previous action in passing a like provision upon the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. If this provision remains in the bill and becomes law and a man sees fit to elect a civilian position with a civilian salary, and thereby, under the operation of this law, could not for the time he is holding this civilian position receive his retired pay, would he then forfeit his right to get his retired pay after his civilian employment terminated?

Mr. COLLINS. No; after his civilian employment terminated he would again begin drawing his retirement pay.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. He would automatically begin drawing his retired pay as a retired officer of the Army?

Mr. COLLINS. The following words appear in this provision:

Shall be entitled, during the period of such incumbency, to retired pay from the United States for or on account of services—

And so forth.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. And there would be no question that when his civilian pay terminated he would begin drawing his retired pay?

Mr. COLLINS. Absolutely not.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman if that section would apply to retired emergency officers?

Mr. COLLINS. I should say so.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I hope it will.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. They are on the retired list.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation for the pay of the Army shall be available for the pay of any officer or enlisted man on active list of the Army who is engaged in any manner with any publication which is or may be issued by or for any branch or organization of the Army or military association in which officers or enlisted men have membership and which carries paid advertising of firms doing business with the Government: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit officers from writing or disseminating articles in accordance with regulations issued by the Secretary of War.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee if the words "any publication which is or may be issued by or for any branch or organization of the Army," cover the cadet papers issued at West Point? One is the Howitzer and the other, I believe, is the Pointer. Does this limitation extend to publications issued at West Point? They are purely college publications.

Mr. COLLINS. It was never the intention of the committee to touch those publications.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. That is very satisfactory. Those two publications are the same as almost every college in this country has, and it is not the intention of the committee to include the two publications issued by the cadets at West Point.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman's statement is correct.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. This language, of course, will not affect the publication of different service journals?

Mr. COLLINS. No.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

TRAVEL, MILITARY AND CIVIL PERSONNEL

For mileage, reimbursement of actual traveling expenses, or per diem allowances in lieu thereof, as authorized by law for official travel on military and nonmilitary duty under the War Department, to commissioned officers (including discharged officers to their homes), warrant officers, contract surgeons, and expert accountant, Inspector General's Department; for transportation of troops, Philippine Scouts, nurses, flying cadets, enlisted men (including discharged enlisted men to their homes or places of enlistment); for transportation of recruits and recruiting parties and of applicants for enlistment between recruiting stations and recruiting depots; and rejected applicants for enlistment; for transportation of dependents of officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men as provided by law; for transportation of general, paroled, escaped, and discharged prisoners and persons discharged from St. Elizabeths Hospital after transfer thereto from the military service to their homes or elsewhere as they may elect, the cost in each case not to be greater than to the place of last enlistment; transportation of cadets and accepted cadets from their homes to the Military Academy and discharged cadets, including reimbursement of traveling expenses; for traveling expenses of civilian witnesses before courts-martial; for traveling expenses of attendants accompanying remains of military personnel and civilian employees; for traveling expenses of civilian employees and other persons under the War Department authorized by law to travel on departmental, military, and nonmilitary duty; and for examination of estimates of appropriations and of military activities in the field, $4,126,865, of which sum $737,478 shall be available exclusively on account of travel in connection with river and harbor and flood control activities under the Corps of Engineers, and no other appropriation in this act shall be available for any expense for or incident to travel of personnel of the Regular Army or civilian employees under the War Department, except the appropriation "Contingencies of the Army" and the appropriations for the National Guard, the Organized Reserves, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the Panama Canal.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, later on in the reading of the bill there will be an amendment offered to restore the citizens' military training camps. If that amendment is adopted—when it is reached some 40 or more pages from the present place in the bill—it will be necessary to incorporate in line 4, on page 16, after the word "Corps" and before the word "and," the words "citizens' military training camps." I would like to have an understanding or agreement at this time that if the amendment to which I have referred is adopted, those words will be incorporated at the place I have indicated.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I will offer no objection to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, why can we not have a unanimous-consent agreement to that effect now?

Mr. COLLINS. I think it would be better to return to it, and I shall offer no objection.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that, in case the amendment with reference to the citizens' military training camps is adopted, permission be given to return to this section in order to incorporate the words to which I have referred.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LaGUARDIA: Page 16, line 4, before the period, insert "Provided, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available for or on account of any expense incident to the permanent change of station of any commissioned officer of the Army except (1) officers appointed to and relieved from positions that are filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, (2) officers detailed to and from Army schools as students, (3) military attachés, (4) officers ordered to and from duty in the Canal Zone and in the Philippines, and (5) officers ordered to replace officers who die or may be separated from the active list."

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted, I shall then move to strike out, on page 15, the amount "$4,126,865" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,997,000."

The purpose of this amendment is to carry into effect section 316 of the McDuffie bill, which passed the House, and which provides:

The President is authorized, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, to restrict the transfer of officers and enlisted men of the military and naval forces from one post or station to another post or station to the greatest extent consistent with the public interest.

What I have in mind is this: My amendment allows sufficient latitude for the normal travel and the normal and necessary transfer of officers and men, but it occurred to me that in this period of extreme economy it might be well to defer any wholesale changes of posts during this one fiscal year. I submit to the House that it is possible to make a saving of over $1,000,000 on this one item. This saving will not impair the efficiency of the Army. The House has passed upon this matter in section 316 of the McDuffie bill, which is now before the Senate.

Here is a proper place to effect a real economy. I repeat, it would not interfere with the normal assignment of officers and men; but it would prevent the wholesale shifting or exchange of posts with the consequent travel cost from one station to another.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The committee, of which I happen to be a member, in dealing with this problem left the question of the removal or transfer from one post of duty to another of officers or enlisted personnel entirely with the President, believing that the President would exercise proper discretion in having the transfers made or in restricting transfers. I do not know whether the gentleman's amendment refers to an emergency or not.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. It would only be applicable to the fiscal year, of course.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It would only be applicable to the fiscal year, and, of course, I hope there may not be any emergencies during the fiscal year; but if the President does make this restriction, it follows that the money will not be expended for the transfer of troops, and I am wondering if the gentleman's amendment might so restrict or curtail the appropriation that in the event the President saw fit to order a transfer the money would not be available for the cost thereof.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I am certain that what the gentleman has in mind would be an emergency, because, after all, troops in one place are just the same troops, whether their number is the Sixteenth Regiment or the Twentieth Regiment. In case of emergency it would be quite different, and then, I think, we would be here anyhow; but I shall be glad to submit it to the gentleman from Mississippi and get his views upon it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. So far as I am personally concerned, while I am not a member of the committee——

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I am simply trying to cooperate in effecting economy, though I did not agree with many items in the so-called economy bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I am going to support every suggestion made here for economy.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, a large amount of this travel comes by reason of the fact they have to remove people who have been assigned to the Tropics and replace them with other troops. I understand that represents the major part of these transfers.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Does the gentleman know——

Mr. SNELL. I do not know, and I am trying to get some information.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Does the gentleman know that there is such a long waiting list for assignments to Hawaii and the Philippines that the officers really wait a long time for assignment there?

Mr. SNELL. That may be true, but they have to transfer them every two years or so on account of the fact they can not live for a long time in such a hot country.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. The amendment of the gentleman from New York exempts travel to and from the Canal Zone and the Philippines. Here is what actuated the committee in this matter. We found that the total of all travel items for all activities under the cognizance of the War Department amounted to $8,912,000, carried in all of the four corners of this bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition.

The committee felt that these travel items should be consolidated so that the Congress would know something about the amount of travel provided in the bill. For that reason we grouped the travel items and took one-fourth off the total, excluding the amounts for travel under rivers and harbors and flood control and the civil components.

In the Navy appropriation bill the committee recommended a reduction of one-third in the amount included in the Budget for travel by officers, and the House has approved one-third in that bill.

I am satisfied, I will say to the gentleman from New York, if the committee had known of the action of the Economy Committee at the time this bill was reported, a larger amount than one-fourth would have been taken off and, so far as I am individually concerned, particularly in view of the provision in the economy measure, I shall accept the amendment of the gentleman from New York because I believe that restrictions on travel should be imposed at this particular time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. And I might add that this is in line with quite a number of letters I have received from officers of the Army throughout the United States as one of the economies that should be effectuated in this bill.

I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. To me this provision is rather restrictive, maybe too restrictive, for the real operations of the Army. Those who are in favor of economy do not wish to do any havoc to the organization. I can conceive of a case where an officer who would be detailed for instruction at one of our Army posts would not be allowed his transportation under these limitations. We should not, under such circumstances, no matter what our desire may be with respect to economy, hamstring the Army so that we will make this body absolutely ridiculous.

Now, I am in favor of well-thought-out amendments, but this amendment would absolutely cripple the Army in its legitimate functions, and we ought not to do anything like that. Take, for instance, an officer assigned for instruction to an Army school. He is not a student; he is detailed for instruction purposes.

Why, gentlemen, we can not legislate on the floor of the House on matters of this moment and support it because some one says it will save a million or two dollars. It makes us ridiculous in the eyes of the country.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. If the officer is an instructor, and he dies, his successor will get travel.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am talking about the officer who might be detailed to Fort Bragg or Fort Benning as an instructor, and he would not be excepted from the purview of this amendment. He is not detailed as a student. He is detailed as an officer.

I can not, on the spur of the moment, state every possible case, but you ought not to cripple the service in this way. The Committee on Military Affairs or the War Department has given no consideration to this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment seeks to restrict the travel and pay of officers of the Army. It limits the officers who may obtain travel pay. The five instances where they may be able to secure travel pay are the following:

First, officers appointed to and relieved from positions that are filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

That is rather restrictive.

Second, officers detailed to and from Army schools as students.

I have pointed out the objection to that, and it has not been met. Officers are detailed to Army schools who are not students, who are instructors.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If an officer is detailed as an instructor, the purpose is to leave him there for the fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Instructors at West Point are detailed for four years' service. That is the rule. They have eight permanent instructors there, and instructors coming from the Army are detailed for four years.

You are going to disrupt the whole service on the plea of economy. We do not want to make ourselves ridiculous. I am in favor of cutting out needless service and have spoken against it, but here is an amendment that has not been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs or the War Department. You are attempting to restrict the activities of the Army in a way that has not been considered, or properly considered.

Mr. JAMES. Suppose an officer is detailed to Porto Rico, how is he going to get there?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Michigan, who knows as much about this matter as anybody on the floor, has pointed out another instance. I can not point out all the conceivable conditions which this amendment might restrict in its operation.

It is proverbial in the history of this House that we can not legislate successfully on the floor of the House. There is no one here who would question my desire for economy, but I do not want to disrupt the whole Army.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. There is no greater advocate of economy in the House than the gentleman from Wisconsin, but does he not think, before a provision of this kind is put into a bill, that there ought to be some hearings, some information given before some committee in a proper way?

Mr. STAFFORD. What does the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriation or our committee do when a proposal is made of an administrative character? We refer it to the War Department, and properly so, for comment, although we have first-hand information ourselves. I have served on the War Department subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations and acquired a lot of information as to War Department affairs. I have served on the Military Affairs Committee, but I would not take the responsibility of offering an amendment just because, perchance, it will save $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 and take the chance of disrupting the entire Army. The gentleman is not here for that purpose, nor am I.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. And the gentleman knows that many times there are things in provisions of this kind that do not appear on their face.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Michigan has cited one instance and I cited one instance. The sensible thing to do is to vote down this amendment, which I believe is conceived with a proper purpose but is ill-considered and would cripple the Army in many respects.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 15, line 20, strike out "$4,120,865" and insert "$3,126,865."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, here is an opportunity to save a million dollars, leaving all of the discretion in the hands of the President just as this House agreed to do when it passed the McDuffie bill. There are no recommendations except that the policies of the War Department should be so conducted as to limit these exchanges and these transfers, which are very costly. All of the objections raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] would be eliminated. It is a saving of $1,000,000 without in any way hampering, restricting, or curtailing the effectiveness of the administration of the Army. There is a great deal of traveling going on. We are trying to save everywhere we can, and it strikes me that there is no hardship if we leave a regiment or a battalion at Fort Jay, N. Y., for one year longer instead of transferring it to a post out West. All the necessary transfers are permissible under existing law. I do not restrict it in any way, but I say that an economic administration by the War Department can easily save a million dollars, and I submit it to the House for your consideration.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the House to the fact that this repeals the "Manchu" law. For years our committee has fought for this law so that officers shall be with troops and not sitting around in Washington or some other place in soft jobs. This absolutely repeals the "Manchu" law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAMES. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman does not want to make any such statement.

Mr. JAMES. I do want to make that statement.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Because under existing law they would have to be transferred, and there is $3,000,000 to transfer them with.

Mr. JAMES. I state that this in effect repeals the law Congress has fought for, for so many years, and that is that officers shall go with troops. We ought not here on the spur of the moment, without discussion or referring it to anyone, amend the national defense law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does not the gentleman believe that $3,126,865 would take care of everything?

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman says that he is leaving it to the President. Why do you want to repeal the national defense law by a proposition of this kind?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is not anything that remotely or in any way can be construed as repealing any law.

Mr. BARBOUR. Would not the President have power any way to order that a certain amount of this money for travel should be expended?

Mr. JAMES. Of course.

Mr. BARBOUR. And by an order of that kind limit the amount that could be expended?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. And the Subcommittee on the War Department Appropriations has brought this amount in here in this bill in substance saying to us that this amount is absolutely necessary.

Mr. JAMES. Yes; and it has been approved by the President as the amount necessary.

Mr. BARBOUR. And not a dollar will have to be expended unless the President deems it necessary to so expend it.

Mr. JAMES. Certainly not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk:

Page 16, line 2, amendment by the committee: Before the word "and" insert "the appropriation 'Air Corps, Army' for flying new aircraft from factory to first destination."

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I feel the House should have an explanation of the reason for that amendment. It was submitted to the committee by General Foulois, Chief of the Air Corps of the Army, and he said it was necessary in order to save money. Otherwise, an officer who goes to a factory for a plane would probably be prohibited from making the trip to the factory and flying the plane back. This enables him to make the trip to the factory and will pay for his transportation. He will fly the plane back rather than make it necessary to ship the plane by freight from the factory to the point of use.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Where is the delivery of the plane?

Mr. COLLINS. The first destination.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is that delivery to the Army?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes. The cost of delivering a plane by flying it from Buffalo, N. Y., to Selfridge Field, Mich., for example, would be $35.88. If the plane were shipped by rail, instead of flown, it would necessitate an expenditure, including packing and crating, of $592.58.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the gentleman does not get my point. I think there is more involved than the mere transportation of the pilot. Does the contract call for delivery of the plane at the aviation field? If it does, then when we go to the factory and take possession of it, delivery is made there, and if anything happens on the way and we lose a plane, we lose $10,000 instead of $595.

Mr. COLLINS. The contract might be made either way. It is made, however, so that it is required that the Army deliver the plane itself from the factory to destination.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman states that our contracts call for delivery of the plane at the factory, then I think it is all right. But if it does not, we are assuming a great deal of risk, that may cost a great deal more than the cost of transportation.

Mr. COLLINS. The amendment accords with the present practice.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. Would not the proviso on page 25 of the bill effect the same thing which the gentleman is trying to effect by another proviso?

Mr. COLLINS. No. That is a different proposition and affects the Quartermaster Corps only. I will say to the committee that this amendment was suggested to me by the Chief of the Air Corps and is in the interest of economy.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. TILSON. Is it not a fact that the delivery of the plane, if sent by train or truck, has to be paid for by the Government?

Mr. COLLINS. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. In either case.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; and by plane or truck the saving would be considerable.

Mr. TILSON. So that if the Government can deliver the plane itself by sending the pilot there it will save the transportation of the plane and also the return transportation of the pilot?

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is, if the plane ever gets to its destination.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. What difference does it make? The plane is delivered in good shape, whether at the factory or at the aviation field. If it is delivered and anything happens to the plane, whether it is at the factory or whether en route, the Government must pay for it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is one more risk that we assume; that is all.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. When we get the plane we begin to operate it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It makes this difference, that if a plane is delivered at the field, we can insist that it be assembled, that it be taken up for trial, and then turned over to us. I want to say I shall not resist this amendment on the information given by the gentleman from Mississippi that our contracts call for f. o. b. delivery. If it were otherwise, this would be foolish.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. F. o. b. where?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. F. o. b. factory.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not necessarily. It might be at a near-by field.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. The point I make is that it makes no difference.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXPENSES OF COURTS-MARTIAL

For expenses of courts-martial, courts of inquiry, military commissions, retiring boards, and compensation of reporters and witnesses attending same, contract stenographic reporting services, and expenses of taking depositions and securing other evidence for use before the same, $55,700.

Mr. GASQUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask the gentleman a question. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he can inform me what is done with the fines that are collected from these court-martial cases? I have been told that those fines are turned over to the National Soldiers' Home in Washington.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman is correct; the law so provides.

Mr. GASQUE. Why should not those fines go toward defraying this expense of $55,700 that is appropriated here?

Mr. COLLINS. Personally, I should like to see the law changed so that all moneys received would go into the United States Treasury and have all expenditures subject to appropriation by Congress, but this is one of the exceptions that has been created by law.

Mr. GASQUE. It has to go there?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. GASQUE. It can not be used for defraying the expenses of this particular item?

Mr. COLLINS. No.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of claims not exceeding $500 each in amount for damages to or loss of private property incident to the training, practice, operation, or maintenance of the Army that have accrued, or may hereafter accrue, from time to time, $100: Provided, That settlement of such claims shall be made by the General Accounting Office, upon the approval and recommendation of the Secretary of War, where the amount of damages has been ascertained by the War Department, and payment thereof will be accepted by the owners of the property in full satisfaction of such damages.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I have some difficulty in construing this paragraph. The Secretary of War is authorized to adjust the payment of claims not exceeding $500, and then there is appropriated only $100 for that purpose.

Mr. COLLINS. We will have a balance on hand at the end of this fiscal year of $16,776.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where did that fund originally come from?

Mr. COLLINS. From prior appropriations, balances of which are carried forward from one year to another.

Mr. STAFFORD. I had a vague impression that, after an appropriation was made in a general appropriation act, it lapsed after two or three years.

Mr. COLLINS. This has been construed as a continuing appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any information as to the average yearly amount of claims paid out of this appropriation?

Mr. COLLINS. In 1931 claims were paid to the extent of $12,932. It is estimated that in 1932 the amount of claims paid will be $11,500. So this appropriation of $100 plus the estimated balance of $16,776 will take care of the claims that it is estimated will be presented during the next fiscal year.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUARTERMASTER CORPS

Subsistence of the Army: Purchase of subsistence supplies: For issue as rations to troops, including retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, civil employees when entitled thereto, hospital matrons, applicants for enlistment while held under observation, general prisoners of war (including Indians held by the Army as prisoners, but for whose subsistence appropriation is not otherwise made), Indians employed by the Army as guides and scouts, and general prisoners at posts; for the subsistence of the masters, officers, crews, and employees of the vessels of the Army Transport Service; hot coffee for troops traveling when supplied with cooked or travel rations; meals for recruiting parties and applicants for enlistment while under observation; for sales to officers, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps while on active duty, and enlisted men of the Army. For payments: Of the regulation allowances of commutation in lieu of rations to enlisted men on furlough, enlisted men when stationed at places where rations in kind can not be economically issued, including retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty and when traveling on detached duty where it is impracticable to carry rations of any kind, enlisted men selected to contest for places or prizes in department and Army rifle competitions when traveling to and from places of contest, applicants for enlistment, and general prisoners while traveling under orders. For payment of the regulation allowances of commutation in lieu of rations for enlisted men, applicants for enlistment while held under observation, civilian employees who are entitled to subsistence at public expense, and general prisoners while sick in hospitals, to be paid to the surgeon in charge; advertising; for providing prizes to be established by the Secretary of War for enlisted men of the Army who graduate from the Army schools for bakers and cooks, the total amount of such prizes at the various schools not to exceed $900 per annum; and for other necessary expenses incident to the purchase, testing, care, preservation, issue, sale, and accounting for subsistence supplies for the Army; in all, $11,714,792: Provided, That none of the money appropriated in this act shall be used for the purchase of oleomargarine or butter substitutes for other than cooking purposes, except to supply an expressed preference therefor or for use where climatic or other conditions render the use of butter impracticable.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I want to point out that while this section looks good in the eyes of Members who are very keen on economy because there is a saving of $10,000,000 on the item of subsistence of the Army, which last year was $21,237,708, yet we have not reduced the enlisted personnel of the Army that is provided with subsistence under this section; and it seems to me that, like many other savings, this is merely a paper saving.

Congress is bent upon increasing commodity prices. This House is on record twice; Congress is on record once in that regard. In all likelihood the Senate will pass the bill which has already passed the House, the effect of which is to increase commodity prices; and I submit in that event the saving will be entirely wiped out, and by the time we come back here in December the first thing we will have to do will be to increase this appropriation to feed the Army for the balance of the fiscal year.

When I suggested a saving on travel I requested something definite and tangible, something that could be accomplished. You have to feed the Army, the Army has to eat, and I do not see how you are going to feed the men by arbitrarily cutting off nearly 50 per cent of the normal appropriation for that purpose when the law fixes the ration. There is no justification for the hope that commodity prices will go down, for, as I say, we are legislating to put them up.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York will permit a statement, I wish to say that I appreciate very keenly his solicitude for the enlisted men in the Army. I have always found him one of their best friends. However, I think he fails to appreciate fully in this instance the action of the committee.

This is the situation: The War Department has been able in past years to build up because of decreasing commodity costs, its working-capital fund. The Army has been able to build up this fund to over seven and one-half millions of dollars. They say they only need a working-capital fund of approximately $5,000,000, if the gentleman pleases. We based the appropriation upon a ration cost of 36 cents. The President fixes the components of the ration. If commodity costs go up, as the gentleman justly anticipates, and I hope his anticipation will be realized, especially as far as foodstuffs are concerned, it will mean the Army can draw upon that working-capital fund of approximately $5,000,000 and add to the 36 cents such an amount as might be necessitated by increased food costs. So as a matter of principle we are appropriating all of the money needed to feed the Army under any conditions which it would seem might arise during the next fiscal year.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Is that capital fund represented by goods in storage or money?

Mr. COLLINS. It is on hand; in stores and money.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Regular supplies of the Army: Regular supplies of the Quartermaster Corps, including their care and protection; stoves required for the use of the Army for heating offices, hospitals, barracks, and quarters, and recruiting stations, and United States disciplinary barracks; also ranges, stoves, coffee roasters, and appliances for cooking and serving food at posts in the field and when traveling, and repair and maintenance of such heating and cooking appliances; authorized issues of candles and matches; for post bakery and bake-oven equipment and apparatus; for ice for issue to organizations of enlisted men and offices at such places as the Secretary of War may determine, and for preservation of stores; authorized issues of soap, toilet paper, and towels; for the necessary furniture, textbooks, paper, and equipment for the post schools and libraries, and for schools for noncommissioned officers; for the purchase and issue of instruments, office furniture, stationery, and other authorized articles for the use of officers' schools at the several military posts; for purchase of commercial newspapers, market reports, etc.; for the tableware and mess furniture for kitchens and mess halls, each and all for the enlisted men, including recruits; for forage, salt, and vinegar for the horses, mules, oxen, and other draft and riding animals of the Quartermaster Corps at the several posts and stations and with the armies in the field, for the horses of the several regiments of Cavalry and batteries of Artillery and such companies of Infantry and Scouts as may be mounted, and for remounts and for the authorized number of officers' horses, including bedding for the animals; for seeds and implements required for the raising of forage at remount depots and on military reservations in the Hawaiian, Philippine, and Panama Canal Departments, and for labor and expenses incident thereto, including, when specifically authorized by the Secretary of War, the cost of irrigation; for the purchase of implements and hire of labor for harvesting hay on military reservations; for straw for soldiers' bedding, stationery, typewriters and exchange of same, including blank books and blank forms for the Army, certificates for discharged soldiers, and for printing department orders and reports, $3,904,926: Provided, That no appropriation in this act shall be available for the purchase of electric ranges for buildings or quarters supplied with gas for cooking purposes or for buildings or quarters upon reservations to which such gas is supplied.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman from Mississippi the reason for carrying the language contained in the proviso on page 21, beginning in line 6 and ending in line 10.

Mr. COLLINS. With reference to electric ranges?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. The committee was fearful that the practice was prevailing of installing electric ranges in houses belonging to the Government and occupied by Army officers, where gas was already available. Realizing that electricity and electric ranges are very much more costly than gas and gas ranges, the committee decided to incorporate this proviso.

Mr. GOSS. Can the gentleman tell us where this is being done?

Mr. COLLINS. It seems to be a pretty general practice if the Budget recommendations are an index.

Mr. GOSS. Is there any specific place? At what places is this being carried on?

Mr. COLLINS. There are a number of places where it was proposed to install electric ranges rather than gas ranges, and we have every reason to believe that gas is already in use at these particular places or at least some of them.

Mr. JAMES. What particular places?

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman will find them enumerated on page 477 of the hearings.

Mr. JAMES. Is gas there now?

Mr. COLLINS. I do not know whether gas is at all of such places, but I am confident that gas is installed at a good many of them.

Mr. JAMES. Did they call your attention to any particular case where that is done?

Mr. COLLINS. That is not essential.

Mr. JAMES. Where does the gentleman find that information?

Mr. COLLINS. On page 477 of the hearings. The provision merely provides, if the gentleman has not observed it, that no appropriation in this act shall be available for the purchase of electric ranges for buildings or quarters supplied with gas for cooking purposes or for buildings or quarters on reservations to which such gas is supplied.

Mr. JAMES. I have read the language, but I thought the committee had some particular evil it was trying to remedy at some particular place.

Mr. COLLINS. The object is to prevent the installation of electric ranges at places where gas ranges are now in use or, in the case of original installations, to require the use of gas ranges wherever practicable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: On page 21, beginning in line 6, strike out the proviso ending in line 10.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this proviso would forbid the use of hydroelectricity for cooking ranges at Army posts where hydroelectricity is cheaper than fuel oil or gas. If I did not have some personal acquaintance with this proposition in private life, I would not rise and offer this amendment. Up in the northern Wisconsin woods electricity is quite cheap. You can buy it for 3 cents per kilowatt hour. My sister has a cottage on Cranberry Lake, where she had installed an electric range. Prior thereto she had used a gasoline range. I am fully conversant with the operation of that electric range, because I batched there for more than six weeks last fall in an effort to recuperate and get back some of the nervous energy I had expended in the Congress before.

I do not think the gentleman from Mississippi wishes to do violence to the modern method used in the culinary art. It is generally accepted that an electric furnace is far more desirable—where electricity is cheap—than gasoline or kerosene.

Why should we incorporate this restrictive proviso in the bill, which will bar in officers and noncommissioned officers' quarters the use of electric ranges, a small 3-plate range which uses electricity that is cheap and which can be operated more economically and more safely than kerosene or gasoline because gas may not be available?

I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will conclude that this is not real economy, but that it is only restrictive on the use of officers' quarters.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I will state to the gentleman that the price of electric current at Fort McPherson is only 2 cents per kilowatt.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am glad to have that contribution. The gentleman from Georgia, who is acquainted with the actual cost of electricity at Fort McPherson, says it only costs 2 cents per kilowatt, while in northern Wisconsin it is 3 cents per kilowatt to my certain knowledge.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. At Fort Lewis it is much less than 2 cents.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where there is hydroelectric power the cost is less. Therefore, gentlemen, why should we put in the bill a restrictive provision forbidding the use of modern culinary equipment?

Mr. PARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. PARKS. If the gentleman's amendment prevails, what will it save the taxpayers in dollars and cents?

Mr. STAFFORD. On page 477, through the courtesy of the gentleman from Connecticut you will find a table showing the cost per kilowatt-hours at the various forts. At Fort Barrancas, Fla., the cost is $0.22. At many posts the rates are much lower. I suggest this to the gentleman from Arkansas: If he were an Army officer living out in the western country or in the southern country, where hydroelectric rates are low, would he not want his wife to use the most modern means of cooking?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman suggests that there might be some saving by reason of installing electric ranges. Knowing how well the gentleman usually draws his amendments, I would suggest to him that he draw some proviso like this:

Provided, That if the Secretary of War should find that the installation of electric ranges would save money to the Government, that then he may authorize the installation of electric equipment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am moving to strike out the proviso which seeks to forbid the use of electricity in connection with cooking at Army posts.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think the gentleman will agree that, generally speaking, when you are cooking in a large way gas is much cheaper than electricity.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question about that at large Army posts, except where hydroelectricity or the white juice is cheaper.

For instance, take the conditions under the example which I cited, and I did not like to refer to a personal experience; but in the case of my sister's cottage in northern Wisconsin we had a 3-plate electric range. Prior to that she had gasoline, because gas was not available. The electric range was much safer, much cleaner, and much more serviceable, and it was just about as cheap as gasoline.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Would not we conserve the idea of economy with the amendment which I have suggested?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be pleased to have the gentleman prepare such an amendment and offer it when this proviso is stricken out.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. What does the gentleman's wife use in his home?

Mr. STAFFORD. I was referring to the fact that this was the situation at my sister's home in northern Wisconsin. I would not charge in this House the gentleman with density of knowledge, so far as my personal relationship is concerned. I have stated my acquaintance with the matter and how it came about that I am acquainted with the operation of an electric range. I stated very frankly that I "batched" there for six weeks and utilized this electric range to my satisfaction.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER] says that electricity is still cheaper in his country. If the gentleman was an Army officer out in the far-western country or down in the southern country where white juice is cheap, he would not want his wife to use gas or gasoline. He would want, I am quite sure, to have the most modern and the cleanest method, and that is the use of white juice.

Mr. PARKS. Let me ask the gentleman this question: If the gentleman's idea prevails, how much money in dollars and cents will it save the Government annually?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think if the Government is going to require the taking out of electric ranges and placing therein gasoline ranges, where gas is not available, or even requiring gas to be used where electricity is just as cheap, it will cost the Government considerably more. Using electricity is not an expensive method, but is a modern method, and is cheaper where we have electricity available, as the gentleman from Georgia suggests is available at Fort McPherson, in his State.

Mr. PARKS. Let me ask the gentleman seriously——

Mr. STAFFORD. I am speaking seriously.

Mr. PARKS. I assume the gentleman is serious, and let me ask how much money will be saved if the gentleman's idea prevails, or would the Government lose money?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think we would lose any money, because this would require the changing of electric ranges to gasoline ranges or gas ranges.

Mr. PARKS. Unless the gentleman can tell me that it will save money, why does the gentleman complain?

Mr. STAFFORD. We have here on page 477 of the hearings the rates charged at the various posts. These rates are not high. They are very moderate and very cheap rates. I think it would be a backward step for the American Army officers and the noncommissioned officers to require their wives to use antiquated equipment and not use modern methods.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Instead of striking out the proviso, how about adding at the end of the proviso "unless the Secretary of War shall determine that the use of electric ranges will mean a saving to the Treasury"?

Mr. STAFFORD. That will be entirely acceptable. If that is agreeable to the gentleman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment that I offered to strike out the proviso, so that the gentleman from Alabama may offer such an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I was just wondering why it is the Government should furnish ranges and stoves and automobiles and almost everything in the world to Federal employees, including Army and Navy officers? I wonder why that is.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is because, Mr. Chairman, these Army officers and noncommissioned officers who give up their life for the time when they will be called upon to defend the country in case of need should have proper living quarters. They should not be required, as was the case at West Point, which was called to my attention on an inspection there, where officers were obliged to live with their families in an ill-conditioned dormitory. It is proper that we should provide proper housing facilities, and if the gentleman from Florida had any acquaintance with conditions about our forts he would know that we have not gone to extravagance. We provide a limit of appropriation that may be used for the building of an Army officer's home and a noncommissioned officer's home. Go into those homes and you will see they are not extravagantly furnished. The officers provide the furniture, and the gentleman, although he is in the same state of single blessedness at his age which I was once—

Mr. GREEN. That is all right, but why should we furnish automobiles, for instance?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Army officers do not furnish that which is a permanent part of the home——

Mr. GREEN. Why should he be furnished——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further.

Mr. GREEN. Then I shall object to the gentleman's request, if he can not yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose of the Government, as well as owners of apartment buildings, is to furnish the permanent equipment to make the homes serviceable, and that includes either a gas range or an electric range, and they should be allowed to furnish electric ranges where electric juice is cheap. That is what I am objecting to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. GREEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, and I shall not object if the gentleman will just be courteous enough to give an explanation or two, but it seems to me we are going rather far afield to furnish automobiles and furnish gasoline and furnish ranges and furnish transportation and furnish almost everything for Federal employees and Army officers and Navy officers. Why not give them a lump sum and let them buy these things for themselves? I want them to have everything that is reasonable, but it seems as if the Federal Government is becoming so paternalistic that the citizens of the country instead of supporting themselves look to the Government to support them in all undertakings.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, the committee went into this matter very carefully. The committee had General Bash before it and asked him in what part of the country electricity was cheaper, and in what part of the country gas was cheaper. We found that gas was cheaper in all parts of the country except in an area of the Pacific Northwest. In all the rest of the country gas was cheaper.

Now, when we add to the cost of current the greater initial cost of electric ranges and the larger maintenance cost, we feel quite certain that it would be much more economical to use gas ranges wherever practicable. For that reason the committee decided to put this proviso in the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. WRIGHT. We also found that the cost of the maintenance of the electric ranges was many times the cost of the maintenance of gas ranges.

Mr. COLLINS. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The hearings show that the cost of electricity is very low in the Northwest, because we have such very cheap power. Electricity is much used there. Would not the gentleman from Mississippi accept the proviso proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL]?

Mr. COLLINS. No, I could not; because we would have to tear out the gas ranges and the coal stoves, and we do not feel that this is the time to do it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think the gentleman is straining at a gnat and not being helpful. We have some places where they use gas plates. Has the gentleman from Mississippi in mind the thought that large electric ranges might be purchased?

Mr. COLLINS. Not necessarily. I have used electricity for cooking, and my bills were outrageous. The cost was just about five times as much as for gas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We sell electricity out there for as low as one-half cent per kilowatt.

Mr. GASQUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. GASQUE. I think there is some misapprehension about this proviso. I do not see anything in the proviso that prohibits anybody using electricity, but it provides that you can not take out a gas range where you have it. If you should take out a gas range and buy an electric range, then you would have to pay $150 or $250.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Suppose you have no gas range or coal stove, and you wanted to put in a new range; under this proviso in the bill, if you found electricity was cheaper, could you put it in?

Mr. COLLINS. In the long run, gas is much cheaper than electricity.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized for three minutes on this item.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, pending that I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ten Members present, a quorum. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Page 21, line 10, after the word "supplied," strike out the period, insert a comma and the following: "unless the Secretary of War shall determine that the use of electric ranges shall mean a saving to the Government."

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order upon the amendment, that it imposes an additional duty upon the executive branch of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman upon the point of order.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clothing and equipage: For cloth, woolens, materials, and for the purchase and manufacture of clothing for the Army, including retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, for issue and for sale; for payment of commutation of clothing due to warrant officers of the Mine Planter Service and to enlisted men; for altering and fitting clothing and washing and cleaning when necessary; for operation of laundries, including purchase and repair of laundry machinery; for the authorized issues of laundry materials for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowances, and for applicants for enlistment while held under observation; for equipment and repair of equipment of dry-cleaning plants, salvage and sorting storehouses, hat-repairing shops, shoe-repair shops, clothing-repair shops, and garbage-reduction works; for equipage, including authorized issues of toilet articles, barbers' and tailors' materials, for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowances and applicants for enlistment while held under observation; issue of toilet kits to recruits upon their first enlistment, and issue of housewives to the Army; for expenses of packing and handling and similar necessaries; for a suit of citizen's outer clothing and when necessary an overcoat, the cost of all not to exceed $30, to be issued to each soldier discharged otherwise than honorably, to each enlisted man convicted by civil court for an offense resulting in confinement in a penitentiary or other civil prison, and to each enlisted man ordered interned by reason of the fact that he is an alien enemy, or, for the same reason, discharged without internment; for indemnity to officers and men of the Army for clothing and bedding, and so forth, destroyed since April 22, 1898, by order of medical officers of the Army for sanitary reasons, $6,776,519, of which amount not exceeding $60,000 shall be available immediately for the procurement and transportation of fuel for the service of the fiscal year 1933.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee if he will put into the RECORD the number of clothing factories now maintained and operated by the Army, the number of laundries, salvage and sorting storehouses, repairing shops, and so forth. Before the last war my understanding is that the Government had abandoned the business of making clothing for the Army and the Navy. During the war these factories were reopened, and they are still in operation. I do not know how many there are, but I wish the gentleman would give us the number for the benefit of the RECORD, and to what extent the War Department is now in the clothing business and other business.

Mr. BYRNS. I think there are four clothing factories in existence now.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It has been stated also that the War Department is maintaining down here at Holabird what some Members call an automobile-manufacturing establishment and what others have seen fit to say is an assembling plant. I think the RECORD should show to what extent the department has gone along that line, and I would like the gentleman to put that into the RECORD also.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have just sent to the desk an amendment that would limit the amount to be manufactured at these plants to 10 per cent, unless it could be manufactured more cheaply than at outside plants; and I want to say something with reference to the clothing situation.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I should be glad to insert the information in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. Sometimes when we begin to strain for economy we quibble over a gnatlike item. We have just passed a paragraph with reference to the purchase of electric ranges—forbidding the purchase—regardless of the fact that in certain parts of the country, notably in the Pacific Northwest, electricity is sold near a large Army division headquarters at the lowest price on the continent. It is but a few years back when at Vancouver Barracks in the State of Washington officers' quarters had in them wood stoves, although gas mains had been thrown all about the military reservation. In other words, because Congress had placed provisions of this kind in the law Vancouver Barracks was 15 years behind the times in the equipment of its officers' quarters. That happened to be in the district I represent, and my attention was called to the fact that they had to cook with wood while practically everybody in the immediate vicinity was cooking with gas. It took a long time to cure that situation. How do these little picayune provisions get into the law? You have an example here in the provision in regard to use of electric ranges. In a year's time it will hardly save enough to wad a shotgun. Then we vote down a further proviso that where electricity is cheaper it may be used.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GREEN. That is just another thing to show that Congress is fiddling while Rome burns. We are just dilly-dallying and voting down economies and preventing economy in government and encouraging paternalism.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I decline to yield further.

Mr. GREEN. I thought the gentleman had concluded.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Officers who are stationed at the various posts have to buy a great many articles themselves. Some equipment is furnished. It has been found economical for the Government to buy and leave permanently at the posts some of the substantial furniture, such as stoves and heavy furniture, and not move them. We make many mistakes when we try to create legislation to fit so many small details. In this last war many officers had to drag their straw for bedding from the supply created by law for horses. It took an act of Congress to change that ludicrous situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 22, line 20, before the period, insert the following: ": Provided, That not to exceed 10 per cent of the total amount that may be expended from appropriations made in this act for and incident to the manufacture and/or production of wearing apparel for enlisted men of the Regular Army shall be expended for the manufacture and/or production of such apparel in Government factories or establishments, except that such limitation may be exceeded to the extent that it may be ascertained, after competitive bidding in accordance with law, that work of such character may be performed at lesser cost in such Government factories or establishments."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment is legislation on an appropriation bill, in violation of rule 21.

In support of that position, I wish to state to the Chairman of the committee that there are a number of decisions which hold that where an amendment seeks to interfere with the discretion that is lodged in a department head, it is legislation, and under existing law the Secretary of War has that authority. There is express law granting authority for the manufacture of clothing for use of the Army.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York seeks to interfere with that law which authorizes the Secretary of War to provide clothing for the Army, in that it requires, under certain conditions, the clothing to be manufactured at private establishments. To that extent it changes existing law.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Wherein does it change existing law?

Mr. STAFFORD. It leaves it to the discretion of some one to say that it may be done by some one else cheaper.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is the law now. Under the existing law the Secretary of War can purchase clothing in a private shop or in one of the Government clothing factories. All my amendment does is to regulate the method of expenditures, and provides that when over 10 per cent of the amount appropriated for clothing is to be expended, then the work shall be given out to the cheaper place. In other words, it provides for competitive bidding, under existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. And to that extent it provides a law that is not on the statute books.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is the law to-day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not as far as clothing is concerned.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I take sharp issue with the conclusions of law submitted by the gentleman from Wisconsin. The gentleman states that my amendment would change existing law. It does not. Under existing law the Secretary of War can advertise for bids and award the contract to the lowest bidder.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not as far as clothing is concerned, where the Government has established Government-operated factories for the sole purpose of manufacturing clothing that is necessary for the arms of the Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I invite a citation of the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. The burden is upon the gentleman from New York and not upon me. The gentleman is the proponent of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York to state what law he refers to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The general law for the purchase of material for the United States Army.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman have the citation in the code?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not have the code before me just now.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BROWNING). The Chair is under the impression that this amendment would impose additional duties on the Secretary of War to ascertain this cost, which the Chair does not believe the law now imposes upon him.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the Chair will bear with me, everything that we purchase, the food and everything else, is purchased in that manner. Everything that is provided in this bill is purchased by competitive bidding. That is the general law, which the Chair must take judicial notice of.

The CHAIRMAN. Does this provision give the Secretary of War additional discretion?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Then what is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The purpose of the amendment is to direct the Secretary of War to buy clothing at the cheapest price and give the award to the lowest bidder, whether it is a Government factory or a private factory.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair thinks under that statement that the Secretary of War would be directed to do something which he only has discretion to do now. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, the debate on this proposition brings to my attention the abuses that have been brought to our attention especially in the last few years that the Government is entering into all kinds of business to the detriment of legitimate business in the United States, for example, that the Government manufactures a great deal of clothing—I do not know at what cost, although I have been told many times that it can be purchased at a lower price than it is being manufactured by the Government—to the impairment of American business. But there are many other complaints against the Government entering into various lines of business.

In this bill we appropriate a large sum of money for a laundry. I am told that Government trucks are used for the collection and delivery of laundry to all the officers, not only to those in camps but to those who live away from camps, all at the expense of the Government.

A few days ago the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON] introduced Resolution No. 214, in which he called attention to the fact that the Government is destroying the restaurant business throughout the United States by establishing restaurants in all the Government buildings. If that be true, I do not blame the small restaurant owners and proprietors from sending protests and complaints against governmental activities which destroy the legitimate business. Perhaps that is in a measure responsible for the destruction of property and business throughout the United States.

Not only does the gentleman show in his resolution that there is a great deal of opposition and objection on the part of restaurant keepers against the Government establishing restaurants in all governmental buildings, whether they be post-office buildings or Federal reserve buildings, but he also objects and complains bitterly that the Government is going into the printing business, selling envelopes and other printed matter. That protest comes from my own State.

This resolution will give the membership a great deal of splendid information; and personally having been very much impressed with the resolution, with the remarks of its author, and with the appeal of the gentleman from Missouri for the consideration of his resolution, I ask unanimous consent to embody the provisions of the resolution in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is it not rather unusual to bodily incorporate a resolution in remarks made on the floor?

Mr. SABATH. It contains so much information which is valuable and helpful in showing the extent to which the Government is going into business that I believe an exception should be made, especially in view of the deplorable conditions that have been brought about, I will not say by Republican misrule, but by causes which could have been controlled.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman does not get the point of my question.

Mr. SABATH. I feel that the gentleman from Washington is entitled to have the information contained in the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact the distinguished gentleman from Illinois has stated the entire purport of the resolution in short, concise language which will be printed in large type, I am inclined to object to the reprinting of the same in extenso in small type.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Washington for his kind remarks and the credit he has given me, but I assure the gentleman that I can in no wise explain the resolution as thoroughly as does the language of the resolution itself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Really, what is to be gained by printing it?

Mr. SABATH. It gives a great deal of information as to activities of the Government in business.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry, but I object.

Mr. SABATH. In view of the objection of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] to embody the resolution, I shall state shortly the underlying reasons for the resolution. The resolution sets forth grievances against the Government for going into business in direct and unfair competition with the citizens during these unprecedented hard times. The gentleman pleads in the interest of depressed business and asserts that the activities of the Government interfere with different lines of business by not only restricting and curtailing their activities but by abolishing them altogether.

In this resolution he sets forth complaints from the Kansas City Chamber of Commerce for the Laundry Owners Association and also numerous complaints that he has received against the establishment of restaurants in the Federal reserve banks in his and other cities and at the same time he shows that the great profits of the Federal reserve banks enable these banks to establish special luxuriously furnished restaurants for the officers. He also sets forth the abuses that are being practiced in this very Capitol among the Government employees in purchasing needs and wants through the Federal agencies at the expense of the Government, thereby depriving the business men of their trade. He asks for an investigation of all of these abuses, and I feel that his request is entitled to serious consideration.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Army transportation: For transportation of Army supplies; of authorized baggage, including packing and crating; of horse equipment; and of funds for the Army; for the alteration, operation, and repair of boats and other vessels; for wharfage, tolls, and ferriage; for drayage and cartage; for the purchase, manufacture (including both material and labor), maintenance, hire, and repair of packsaddles and harness; for the purchase, hire, operation, maintenance, and repair of wagons, carts, drays, other vehicles, and horse-drawn and motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official military and garrison purposes; for hire of draft and pack animals; for travel allowances to officers of National Guard on discharge from Federal service as prescribed in the act of March 2, 1901 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 751), and to enlisted men of National Guard on discharge from Federal service, as prescribed in amendatory act of September 22, 1922 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 752), and to members of the National Guard who have been mustered into Federal service and discharged on account of physical disability; in all, $9,555,854, of which amount not exceeding $250,000 shall be available immediately for the procurement and transportation of fuel for the service of the fiscal year 1933: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for the purchase or exchange of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles other than not exceeding $80,000 for the purchase or exchange of motor-propelled ambulances and motor cycles, and not exceeding $150,000 of this appropriation shall be available for the purchase or exchange of motor-propelled trucks, including station-wagon types: Provided further, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available for any expense for or incident to the transportation of privately owned automobiles except on account of the return to the United States of such privately owned automobiles as may be in transit to or from points outside of the continental limits of the United States or have been transported to such outside points at public expense on or by the date of the approval of this act: Provided further, That no motor-propelled vehicle procured out of appropriations for the Regular Army that is more than two years old from the date of purchase shall be transferred to the custody and maintenance of any of the civil components of the Regular Army or to any of the activities embraced by Title II of this act: Provided further, That during the fiscal year 1933 the cost of transportation from point of origin to the first point of storage or consumption of supplies, equipment, and material in connection with the manufacturing and purchasing activities of the Quartermaster Corps may be charged to the appropriations from which such supplies, equipment, and material are procured.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the proviso beginning with line 9 on page 25 and extending down to line 15, that it is legislation on an appropriation bill and unauthorized by law; and, further, I would state to the Chair there is no such thing as a civilian component of the Regular Army.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from Mississippi cite the Chair any authority of law for this provision?

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, the object and purpose of this is to prevent the Regular Army from turning over to civilian components, such as the National Guard and the Organized Reserves, a lot of old, worn-out equipment which costs more to maintain than it is worth, and which in the end seems to be not a real saving to the Government.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that the gentleman from Mississippi is addressing his remarks to the point of order, but is making an explanation of this proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from Mississippi on the point of order. The Chair inferred from the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi that he is making the point it involves a reduction of expenditures.

Mr. COLLINS. That is true, Mr. Chairman. However, I know of no permanent law authorizing the transfer of material such as the proviso in question is directed against.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair this is clearly legislation, and unless it comes under the provisions of the Holman rule it would not be in order. Therefore, unless some gentleman wishes to be heard to cite something more illuminating with reference to it, the Chair will sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Connecticut. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. COLLINS:

Page 25, line 9, after the colon, insert: "Provided further, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available for any expense for or incident to the maintenance, operation, or repair of any motor-propelled vehicle procured out of appropriations for the Regular Army or to any of the activities embraced by Title II of this act that is more than two years old from the date of purchase at the time of such transfer."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment on the basis of a purported limitation making unlawful that which before was lawful, or making lawful that which before was unlawful.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, this is to put a limitation on the use of money.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LANHAM). In the opinion of the Chair the provisions in this amendment are purely a matter of limitation and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

In spite of the fine reading of our reading clerk, Mr. Chaffee, who must hold the record for fast reading, I was able to discover only four "provided furthers" on these two pages, and the decision of the Chair has just disclosed the fact that one of these "provided furthers" was an attempt at legislation on an appropriation bill.

I have noticed in previous Congresses, just as it has occurred here to-day, that these chairmen of the subcommittees of the great Appropriations Committee attempt to carry legislation on an appropriation bill which they know is neither in accord with the spirit or intent of the whole Budget system.

When they are stopped with a point of order against that legislation they almost invariably have in their hands, typewritten and ready for presentation, a revision and reduction of the very thing that is attempted, so that when a point of order is made against the "provided further," and so forth, they can then offer a straight-out reduction which will stand up under the Holman and other rules.

I have contended for a good many years past that if the Appropriations Committee was not watched all the time the temptation would be to exceed their authority in each and every appropriation bill. They have done it in past Congresses and are trying to do it in this Congress.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would be glad to yield, but the gentleman can get all the time he desires. This is a quiet afternoon, and by agreement it seems that we are to progress with the bill this day only to a certain point.

I contend that one of the best things the House of Representatives can do is to watch the Appropriations Committee. For the last 10 or 12 years or for a longer period we have been acquiring the habit of rushing through these appropriation bills as if they were the only things that had to be accomplished and must be done before the night of the day on which they are introduced, starting sometimes even before the bill itself has been printed. I am inclined to think that some of the troubles in connection with the present large deficit may be due to the fact that the membership of the House of Representatives has accepted a sort of "go-along" attitude in step with the 35 members of the Appropriations Committee. In other Congresses the members of this great committee have acted rather in unison, and have tried to avoid friction on the floor. They have trimmed a few seeds here and there, under the Budget estimates, but it seems that all hands—Budget, committee, and Members on both sides—have just breezed along—always upward—until suddenly we find that the system of income-tax collection is the most uncertain form of raising revenue ever devised, so that when individual incomes disappear, payments into the Treasury disappear, and we come up against a great Budget deficit.

With this particular bill the committee has trimmed and cut here and there, squeezed in legislation, and added more "provided furthers," than you should find in any appropriation bill unless a special rule is provided to take care of the legislative features.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not just understand the grudge the gentleman from Washington has against the Appropriations Committee or this particular bill.

This is an economy proposition, I will say to my friend from Washington.

This proposal is made simply for the purpose of preventing the War Department from transferring to the National Guard and to the military parks and other adjuncts of the War Department which come under its jurisdiction old, worn-out automobiles. When they are transferred they cost more money to maintain than they are worth. This amendment is offered to the bill in order to save money for the Government. These old worn-out automobiles ought to be sold, if they have any value at all, and the money turned into the Treasury. If they have no value, we certainly ought not to transfer them to the National Guard or to the military parks throughout the country and then have the expense of maintaining them.

Now, so far as legislation on appropriation bills is concerned, I want to make this statement to the gentleman, and I appeal to the members of the committee who understand what is in these bill for verification of what I say. The appropriation bills for several years under my predecessors, Hon. WILL R. WOOD, of Indiana, and Hon. Martin B. Madden, of Illinois, have been cleaner of legislation than ever before in the history of the Congress, and I refer to the bills to prove this fact.

The Committee on Appropriations avoids putting legislation upon appropriation bills, and when these matters come up in committee they are called to the attention of the legislative committees, as the chairman of those committees can testify. The committee avoids putting legislation on an appropriation bill whenever it is possible; but when it appears in the course of the hearings that there is a little matter of saving that can be made for the Government by putting a provision on the appropriation bill, and it is a matter that would not be considered of sufficient inportance to form the subject of an independent legislative bill, we bring it in here, and I am sorry to find the gentleman from Washington criticizing the committee for having done so.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. JAMES. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee think that this reduction of 2,000 officers was clearly legislation, which should have been passed on by the House Military Affairs Committee?

Mr. BYRNS. It was not so held, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. JAMES. That does not make a bit of difference; it was legislation, nevertheless.

Mr. BYRNS. It was not so held; and I will say to the gentleman that that amendment was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and was approved by him and by the ranking minority member of that committee.

Mr. JAMES. Not the provision with respect to the reduction of 2,000 officers.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; it was. That was the amendment which the committee adopted. It came from the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, I will say to my good friend from Michigan.

Mr. JAMES. It is a matter that was never considered by the House Military Affairs Committee, and no one was authorized, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] will state, to offer any such amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman from Alabama himself urged the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. JAMES. As an individual; yes.

Mr. BYRNS. I understand that, and the chairman and the ranking member of that committee approved it here, and not only approved it, but it was an amendment which was prepared and introduced by the chairman of that committee and the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. JAMES. Still, it was legislation.

Mr. BYRNS. No; it was held in order by the presiding officer.

Mr. JAMES. When Mr. Madden was chairman of the Appropriations Committee there was a provision restricting the number of enlisted men to 118,750, and, at my request, when I called his attention to the fact it was legislation, it was stricken from the bill. Now, the authorized strength of the Army is 280,750, but the committee appropriates the money for 118,750, although the authorized strength is 280,750.

Mr. BYRNS. I am not disputing that fact, and the gentleman could have offered an amendment increasing it if the gentleman had desired to do so.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the proviso beginning in line 15, on page 25.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the proviso in line 15, on page 20, and extending to the end of line 21.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is pending, the Chair will say to the gentleman from Washington, which must be disposed of before further amendments are in order.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, for nearly 12 years the Republican majority in this House have gone wild on expenditures. They have expended money right and left, and I do not blame the country for demanding now that we stop the reckless expenditure of money that has been practiced by this House under the control of the Republican Party. I notice, however, that it is almost absolutely impossible to stop the promiscuous expenditures, because every time a measure is brought on the floor by the committee to reduce some of these extraordinary expenditures, we see gentlemen on the Republican side rise and oppose the committee with all the determination at their command.

We saw it yesterday on the very proposition to which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] alluded. When the chairman of the committee [Mr. COLLINS] tried his utmost to reduce expenditures, I observed that nearly all Members on the Republican side of the aisle voted against that amendment that will save nearly $300,000,000.

Notwithstanding that, we read in the Republican press every day of demands that are made on us to balance the Budget. It is clear to anyone that they are trying to hold the slim Democratic majority of this House responsible for this task, and are asking them to bring about the impossible.

Is it not time that you gentlemen on that side assist us in bringing about economies and in trying to balance the Budget?

You can not go home and tell your constituents that you are going to practice economy and then on the floor of the House, at every chance you get, vote against any measure making for economy.

I think it is manifestly unfair to the country to resort to this double-dealing. It is manifestly unfair to criticize the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, because he has earnestly tried to bring about economies and reduce Government expenditures.

The gentlemen from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] a few moments ago complained that Government incomes have been reduced; and that is true, because business has been ruined. But neither he nor any other Member offers any plan by which the revenue of the Government could be increased, and most of you have voted against the revenue bill we passed a few weeks ago. I realize that it is much easier to vote against all tax or revenue bills and for all appropriations, and thereby please all of those who object not only to increases in taxes but to paying any taxes, and to vote for all appropriations asked by the departments and bureaus and officials.

And that is just what you Republicans have been doing the last 12 years. Yes; for 12 years you have preached and promised economy and practiced criminal extravagance, so that to-day, due to your reckless legislation last year, we are confronted with a deficit of $2,500,000,000. It is even hard for the majority of the Members to realize what a tremendous sum of money this shortage, which you Republicans caused, is. And, so as to bring it home as plainly and as forcibly as I can, I want you and the country to realize that it is two and one-half times as much as it cost the Government to operate 40 years ago, when Mr. Thomas Reed was the Speaker, and when the appropriation reached $1,000,000,000.

Please understand that appropriation was for running the Government for two years, and the deficit or the shortage for this fiscal year alone is $2,500,000,000, or five times as much as the entire cost of Government for one year. I am trying to bring home to you and to the country what you are guilty of. It is amazing that, notwithstanding these facts, you still persist, yes, that you Republicans have the temerity to herald from the White House and through the press a demand that the Budget be balanced and expenditures be reduced; this was stated only yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] speaking for the President, and within five minutes after he had delivered the President's economy speech, all but 23—I repeat, 23—of you voted against the main reduction in the bill. Oh, how long do you believe you can fool the country and the people at home?

Can any one of you or can any paper inform me or the country how the Budget can be balanced if we do not reduce expenditures and raise the income of the Government? I say to you Republicans, who are responsible for this great deficit, that you can not escape; you can not unload on the Democratic majority the entire load; some of you should—yes; must—help eliminate every useless department or bureau, most of the commissions, and every useless employee, and stop giving out fat and juicy contracts to your favorite contractors, manufacturers, and supply agents. I realize that it will be hard to reduce the Army appropriation bill in face of militaristic propaganda disseminated by the Army and Navy League and its many generals and stimulated by the national-defense slogan; but, gentlemen, our duty is plain; we must do this no matter how unpleasant it may be.

Now as to the increase in our income, in addition to the revenue bill, which we have passed and which is now being revised in the Senate. We can raise from $300,000,000 to $400,000,000 if we will pass the beer bill. Some of you gentlemen may not know that I have spoken at length for the purpose of preventing an adjournment in order to secure the last necessary signature to the discharge petition. The jubilant outcry on the part of the few gentlemen was due to the fact that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BACHMANN] and the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] have attached their signatures to the petition on the Speaker's table giving us the required number to force a vote on the bill H. R. 10017, known as the beer bill.

This will give every Member a chance to go on record for this country-wide demand to amend the crime-breeding Volstead law and, at the same time, will bring in a revenue or an income that the people are willing to pay. I am pleased that all of you will have the opportunity to vote on this question and I hope that you will vote in favor of the resolution and thereby comply with the wishes and demands of the people in your districts and in the country at large.

Please take notice that all of the wise Senators and Members understand and recognize this country-wide demand, as was demonstrated not only in Pennsylvania and Ohio but in nearly every State where the question was raised. I realize that many of you did not wish to sign, believing that you would be able to straddle the question. Fortunately, however, the matter will come to a vote. You must vote, and I hope that you will cast your vote for the resolution and thereby assure yourself of reelection. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the proviso extending from line 20, page 24, to and including line 1, page 25, and substitute therefor the following:

"None of the funds appropriated in this act, unless expressly made available for the purpose, shall be used for the purchase or exchange of motor-propelled freight or passenger carrying vehicles, except those that are purchased solely for experimental purposes, in excess of $100,000 for passenger-carrying vehicles, and in excess of $500,000 for the purchase of freight-carrying vehicles."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that one minute remains under the motion to close debate, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, my purpose is to call the attention of the House to the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, that these old cars are not only expensive but exceedingly dangerous to transportation on the highway. This is only half the amount asked for by the Budget for trucks, and approximately 20 per cent of the amount asked for by the Budget for passenger-carrying cars. New cars would be an economy, I am sure.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

HORSES, DRAFT AND PACK ANIMALS

For the purchase of draft and pack animals and horses within limits as to age, sex, and size to be prescribed by the Secretary of War for remounts for officers entitled to public mounts, for the United States Military Academy, and for such organizations and members of the military service as may be required to be mounted, and for all expenses incident to such purchases (including $120,000 for encouragement of the breeding of riding horses suitable for the Army, in cooperation with the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, including the purchase of animals for breeding purposes and their maintenance), $202,500.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Page 26, line 8, strike out "$202,500" and insert "$203,500."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is intended to be pro forma. It pays to take a little time to read these appropriation bills by paragraphs. I beg to say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] that I did not mean to be discourteous in declining to yield for a moment. I thought my time had just about expired. Inquiries are often offered to divert one's thought, though I know the gentleman from Tennessee never does such a thing intentionally. I fully appreciate the difficult position that he holds as chairman of a most important committee. Further, I do not like to touch the members of the Committee on Appropriations on the quick, and we must remember that they have hard jobs, and that the membership changes in each Congress. During several preceding Congresses I have made it a point of asking each subcommittee chairman whether he had any new legislation in his bill, and each and every one of them, when asked that question on the floor, has said positively no. Mr. Cramton, formerly a Member of the House, said he had none, absolutely none. None whatever. Then he modified his statement to hardly any. I asked the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] if he had any legislation in this bill, as the RECORD will show, and he answered with a mild but decisive no, when every Member who is following the proceedings knew that while Mr. COLLINS might have had it in his mind that he did not, it had provisions which in fact enacted new legislation. He was in hopes that he could get through favorable decisions under the Holman rule; but if not, he was and is ready with amendments to take the place of any that are declared to be not in order. I have gone along with the economy program. I know that we will have to go farther, but it will never do for the House of Representatives to let the situation get away from itself to the point where the Members think that whatever is written in an appropriation bill is correct from start to finish; and if it takes me a little time this quiet Saturday afternoon, when the attendance here is light, even if we are reaching the point in the bill where we want to rise, I am going to take sufficient time to state the situation. I can be lectured by all gentlemen who please to do so.

When the time comes when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], as chairman, has some real economies that are not tied and cross-tied with some of his own pet ideas that he is trying to put over without consideration by the committee, I am going to go along with him. I think I will have accomplished something if I have impressed the membership that when they are handed on short notice an appropriation bill together with the hearings, which in this case cost some $15,000 alone to print, although it was not given to us in time to read before the bill was taken up, when they see a lot of "provided furthers," they will do well to take a second look in order to ascertain what legislation is slipped in.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman speaks of lecturing. All of this trouble came from a lecture that the gentleman delivered to this committee. The gentleman is the first offender when it comes to lecturing this committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can stand lecturing.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman deserves a little lecturing himself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And I want to say to the distinguished gentleman from Alabama that he showed within the last 8 or 10 days that he is the grand past master of lecturing, with all of its degrees—A. B., M. A., LL. D., and all the rest of them—and even on the radio he lectured Congress and the whole people of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. I am sorry that it has no effect upon the gentleman from Washington. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; because, as intimated, I have done some lecturing to-day myself, and besides I like to look into things.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I shall not detain the committee except to call the attention of the gentleman from Washington to the fact that every appropriation bill that is reported to the House carries in the report a statement showing just what legislation is proposed in the way of limitations or otherwise on any particular appropriation bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman think that the carrying in a report, printed at the last minute, of proposed legislative changes in an appropriation bill complies completely with the intent and purposes of the provisions under which the Budget was set up and under which Congress was then guaranteeing that the rights of the several committees which have been appropriating committees but would thereafter be legislative committees, would be guaranteed?

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman can have no quarrel with me about the matter of carrying legislation on appropriation bills. I have had similar opinion during all these past years. I do not believe legislation ought to be carried on an appropriation bill except where it is plainly necessary in order to save money carried in the bill, and then only when it is impossible to secure the necessary legislation to save it. That was the reason for the rule that was adopted at the instance of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER], which sets forth that whenever there is any change in existing law in an appropriation it should be clearly shown by printing the present law and also the contemplated change. This in itself was a recognition upon the part of the House that there are some cases and some circumstances where there should be legislation carried on appropriation bills. What I rose to call to the attention of my friend from Washington was that if he has not a report of the committee, I will be glad to furnish him the one I have. From that he will find that since May 5, nine days ago, there has been here in the House a report from the Committee on Appropriations showing every line of proposed legislation in this bill.

So when the gentleman undertakes to say that the Committee on Appropriations is seeking to put something over without the House knowing just what is being done, I think the gentleman is doing the committee a serious injustice.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We are singing a duet. I have argued for a long time that in order to keep up with conditions in the Federal Government the Appropriations Committee was required to make some small amount of legislation; but I believe that there should be special rules granted to cover all serious legislative proposals on appropriations.

Mr. BYRNS. Then there is not so much difference between the gentleman and me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not much; but I further contend that a committee of 35, after it has been given so much power and authority, should not be overbold in the use of it. It has led to inattention on the part of other Members. We have proof of that. I am inclined to disagree with the gentleman to the effect that this report has been available since May 5. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole and ordered printed; but if I remember correctly, it was hard to find that report, and I know we could not find a printed bill at the time debate began on the bill.

Mr. BYRNS. Other Members found it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, they say they did.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman will remember that this bill was taken up under unusual circumstances. When it was reported it was not expected that it would be taken up until the next day, but the business of the House was concluded earlier than expected, I think it was Calendar Wednesday, and then it was thought in the interest of expediting business that we should proceed with general debate for the balance of the afternoon. But it was not originally expected to be taken up, as far as the committee was concerned, until the next day; and the report and the bill were available the next morning and have been available since May 6.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Now we have come out of the same end of the funnel. We have agreed that the bill was not ready.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

MILITARY POSTS

For construction and installation at military posts, including the United States Military Academy, of buildings, utilities, and appurtenances thereto, including interior facilities, necessary service connections to water, sewer, gas, and electric mains, and similar improvements, all within the authorized limits of cost of such buildings, as authorized by the acts approved June 18, 1930 (46 Stat. 781), and July 3, 1930 (46 Stat. 1014), without reference to sections 1136 and 3734, Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 1339; title 40, secs. 259, 267), including also the engagement, by contract or otherwise, without regard to section 3709, Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5), and at such rates of compensation as the Secretary of War may determine, of the services of architects, or firms, or corporations thereof, and other technical and professional personnel as may be necessary, $2,250,000, which shall be available immediately for the payment of obligations incurred under the contract authorization for these purposes carried in the War Department appropriation act for the fiscal year 1932.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. THOMASON: Page 27, line 4, strike out the period and add the following: "Provided, That the designation of Fort D. A. Russell as a permanent post by general order, War Department, December 11, 1929, shall be continued to and including the 1st day of July, 1933."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is legislation on an appropriation bill. This makes no retrenchment. In fact, it will increase the appropriation, and it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. THOMASON. Yes. I take sharp issue with the gentleman from Connecticut in saying that it means no retrenchment or economy. I contend the amendment is germane.

Mr. GOSS. Does the gentleman not admit that it is legislation on an appropriation bill?

Mr. THOMASON. It is legislation in the sense that other amendments to this bill were construed under the Holman rule to be legislation; but may I explain this in order that the gentleman may understand why I say it does look toward retrenchment and economy?

The situation is that here is a permanent military post, so designated by the War Department official order of December 11, 1929, designating it as a permanent post. More than $1,000,000 is invested there now. They own 476 acres of land. They have 180 permanent structures, with every kind of modern convenience for an up-to-date military post.

Now, I am a friend of the War Department, and I am a friend to those in control of the department, but nevertheless the department arbitrarily says, "We are going to abandon that post, whether or no."

In addition to that, the 2 Senators from Texas, 18 Congressmen, including the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the State legislature, many civic bodies, and communities, protested, and here is a letter which I hold in my hand——

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. THOMASON. I am coming to the reason for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will confine his remarks to the point of order.

Mr. THOMASON. The amendment seeks to prevent the abandonment of this post at a cost of a million dollars during this fiscal year. It is a matter of both economy and protection. All through this bill there are items for the transportation of soldiers, and I hold in my hand a letter from General Moseley, Deputy Chief of Staff, written last week to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in which he said that on the 1st day of next January they are going to move those soldiers to Camp Knox, Ky.

It strikes me that Congress ought to have something to say about that when the taxpayers are the ones paying for it. For the time being I will lay aside the question of the protection of my people along that far-flung Mexican border, but will say that the War Department is not dealing in good faith with those people. Fort Russell is a permanent post, and the record so shows. They spent more than a million dollars there, and now, without consulting Congress and without good reason, the department, through General Moseley, writes to the Speaker of this House and says, "On the 1st day of January we are going to abandon that post and ship those soldiers to Camp Knox, Ky.," which is nothing more than an old cantonment, with a lot of temporary buildings. That is where your money goes. When that is done you will be asked to appropriate a million dollars to improve Camp Knox.

I say the amendment is germane, Mr. Chairman, because it looks to the saving of untold thousands of dollars in the transportation of 600 soldiers and their horses and equipment, as well as the abandonment of more than a million dollars' worth of property along that Mexican border; and, if soldiers are needed anywhere, it is there.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order to allow the gentleman from Texas to make his speech?

Mr. GOSS. I will reserve the point of order for a few moments, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. THOMASON. I do not want to trespass upon the time of the House, but you should know the facts, because I hold here the original order issued by the War Department, General Order No. 20, of December 11, 1929; and may I say by way of preface that when the World War came on they established just a camp down there and called it Camp Marfa. Later, when they had the Mexican raids, the Brite ranch raid and other raids in which American citizens were killed, the War Department in its wisdom issued an order making it a permanent post and changing the name from Camp Marfa to Fort D. A. Russell, because in the meantime Senator Warren had died and they named the old fort in Wyoming after him and named the fort down there Fort D. A. Russell and designated it as a permanent post.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Is it not true—at least it is my recollection from an inspection—that this is a splendidly equipped post in a very strong strategic position, and one that should commend itself as a post of great usefulness from a military standpoint?

Mr. THOMASON. I thank the gentleman for his statement. This camp is in what is known as the Big Bend country of Texas. It is 75 miles from there to the Mexican border. It is more than 200 miles to the first Army post west of there, at El Paso. It is nearly 500 miles to San Antonio, yet the War Department arbitrarily orders its abandonment; and, although the Legislature of Texas, the entire Texas delegation in Congress, and every civic organization of any importance in the State has petitioned the War Department not to do this for two reasons—first, because it is needed protection to the people along that border, and, second, because its abandonment means the expenditure of thousands of dollars of money. I am for economy and I am for national defense; but I say this is neither.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield.

Mr. JAMES. Where does the War Department intend to move the troops?

Mr. THOMASON. Here is a letter from General Moseley, which says that on the 1st day of January next, in spite of the protests made by several thousand Texans, the troops will be moved to Camp Knox, Ky., which is an old cantonment composed of a lot of temporary buildings.

I make this prediction: If that is done, they will be back here asking for another million to build up Camp Knox. They want to abandon Fort Russell, located at a place where it is needed, and build up an old cantonment.

The place we most need troops in these days is along the Mexican border. If there is any place where an active military establishment is needed in peace time, it is along the Texas border; yet they propose to literally abandon Fort Russell and make it a junk pile.

When the War Department issued orders making it a permanent post, the citizens of the little city of Marfa, having a population of four or five thousand, taxed themselves to the utmost to pave streets, install sewer lines, put in water lines and other public works; and now the War Department, without consulting Congress, proposes abandonment. There are a number of small posts in the interior that ought to be abandoned, and the Congressmen from those districts are not objecting. I do not believe that this body approves any such policy.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. If there is one place in this country where we need a strong post, it is on the Mexican border.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, I thank my friend the gentleman from Alabama for that statement, and say if in times of peace there is any place where soldiers are needed it is along the Mexican border.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I must insist on my point of order.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has control of the time.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. How much time has the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has five minutes. The gentleman from Connecticut reserved his point of order.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Texas will offer an amendment to this bill taking 25 per cent off the appropriations for carrying troops to the Hawaiian Islands I will back him, and I know there are many others who will back him.

Mr. THOMASON. I will say this to my good friend from Nevada, that I am going to work for economy consistent with adequate national defense.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not addressing his remarks to the point of order.

Mr. THOMASON. I think, Mr. Chairman, I am talking about economy as well as the protection of American citizens. I am naturally a partisan in this matter because they are taking adequate protection from the people I have the honor to represent, as well as proposing to waste a lot of money. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Permit the Chair to state that the gentleman from Texas did not have to confine his remarks to the point of order, because the gentleman from Connecticut had reserved a point of order and the gentleman from Texas was privileged to proceed for five minutes. Does the gentleman from Connecticut now insist on his point of order?

Mr. GOSS. I do.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COOPER of Tennessee). The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas clearly proposes a provision of substantive law directing that Fort D. A. Russell shall be continued for a definite period of time. The Chair is constrained to hold that is legislation offered to an appropriation bill, and therefore the point of order is sustained.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this to direct a question to the chairman of the subcommittee concerning this whole paragraph on military posts. I have just been going through the hearings and I find there are nearly 225 pages which deal in great detail with the building program that is under way on this general housing proposition. The question I wish to direct to the chairman is this: By reason of this great amount of material the average Member of the House can not get much direct information as to whether it has been gone into carefully to see if any further reductions can be made. Now, will the gentleman please answer that question in a general way?

Mr. COLLINS. Congress has heretofore authorized certain construction and the amount carried in this bill is the amount that is needed virtually to complete that program.

Mr. KETCHAM. I am prompted to ask the question because yesterday we took certain action with reference to about 2,000 officers. What effect, if any, will that have on this housing program?

Mr. COLLINS. The effect of that will be simply this: There is an anticipated program involving over $97,000,000; a future authorization program involving over $97,000,000. That will be offered to the Congress in increments from time to time. Much of that unauthorized program will be unnecessary if we reduce the officer personnel. Unless the action of yesterday be sustained the Congress is going to be called upon in the immediate future to appropriate something like $19,000,000 for the purpose of housing the proportionate number of 2,000 officers, for whom it will be necessary to provide housing accommodations.

Mr. KETCHAM. The particular thing I had in mind was, in view of the situation we are asked to meet, whether the $2,250,000 could be reduced in any degree?

Mr. COLLINS. That is for work in progress and under contract.

Mr. KETCHAM. And can not be decreased without great harm?

Mr. COLLINS. No.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. In other words, the contract for this work was authorized in the last appropriation bill?

Mr. COLLINS. That is right.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. We are just carrying out the obligation which we undertook in the last appropriation bill.

Mr. COLLINS. That was provided for in the last appropriation bill.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee if there are any funds provided in this section to be used at the Military Academy at West Point to finish the buildings in process of construction?

Mr. COLLINS. None. The gentleman will find a statement on page 220 of the hearings showing where this money will be expended.

Mr. FISH. No money is included in this paragraph for construction purposes at West Point.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. FISH. In the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman, I would like to take the opportunity, if it is permissible, to include in the RECORD a letter written many years ago regarding the services of the Engineer Corps of the United States Army which applies with equal force to-day. Not so many days ago the Congress passed legislation creating a Public Works Administration and provided that officers of the Engineer Corps of the Army should be used on Federal public works as far as possible. There was a good deal of controversy at that time not only as to the merits of the proposition but as to the advisability of using so extensively the services of the Engineer Corps. I have just come across a letter written over 75 years ago to my grandfather, who was then in the Senate, by one of the most eminent citizens of New York State, who gives in detail the advantages of using Engineer officers on public works and protesting any attempts to displace them for political purposes. We are confronted with the same issue to-day. In view of the fact that these Engineer officers have been rendering important services to the country for over a century, both in peace and war, and are doing so at this very moment, I would like to have the Clerk, in my time, read the letter which I am sending to the desk. I believe in giving credit where credit is due. The record of the Engineer Corps speaks for itself, and the letter only adds further commendation and practical reasons for the employment of Engineer officers on public works.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, January 6, 1854.

Hon. HAMILTON FISH,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: We are informed that a movement is on foot in Congress to displace the officers of the Army who are in charge of public works, and to substitute civilians. Regarding such a result as a great public calamity, we venture to solicit your exertions to defeat any such scheme, and for the following reasons:

1. Because the officers of the Engineer Corps are the most competent men in the country to take charge of the public works, having received an education which expressly fits them for such employment—so much so that it is a well-known fact that their services are eagerly sought for in all difficult civil works.

2. Because it is the most economical system of management for the Government, who is thus enabled to give employment in time of peace to a body of men upon whom in time of war the efficiency of all military operations must depend.

3. Because the works themselves are better and more cheaply built when designed and constructed by scientific men, acting upon a system of scientific principles, and whose tenure of office does not depend upon every political breath that blows. Civilians would come in and go out with every change in the administration, and each new officer would bring a new plan, and the cost of changes and alterations would be greater than the necessary cost of construction on any one system.

(4) If the works are intrusted to civilians appointed by political influence and for their political services, the same system of corruption which has tainted our municipal corporations would soon be inaugurated under the General Government, and the honesty and vigilance of the most active and incorruptible Secretary of the Treasury would be utterly inadequate to withstand the universal tide of extravagance and plunder.

(5) We have had considerable experience in the way of business with the Government. We have invariably found the officers of the Army intelligent, industrious, persevering, economical, and with an eye single to the interests of the Government. The tone of honor which pervades them as a body is an effectual barrier against fraud or corruption.

Let the list of defaulters answer, and that list is small compared with the petty brands which never come to light.

We feel sure that in any measure having reference to this matter we will find your vote, as we have always found it, on the side of justice, economy, and public virtue.

We have the honor to be, with great respect,

Your friends and servants,

PETER COOPER.
COOPER & HEWITT.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

BARRACKS AND QUARTERS AND OTHER BUILDINGS AND UTILITIES

For all expenses incident to the construction, installation, operation, and maintenance of buildings, utilities, appurtenances, and accessories necessary for the shelter, protection, and accommodation of the Army and its personnel and property, where not specifically provided for in other appropriations, including personal services, purchase and repair of furniture for quarters for officers, warrant officers, and noncommissioned officers, and officers' messes and wall lockers and refrigerators for Government-owned buildings as may be approved by the Secretary of War, care and improvement of grounds, flooring, and framing for tents, rental of buildings, including not to exceed $900 in the District of Columbia, provided space is not available in Government-owned buildings, and grounds for military purposes and lodgings for recruits and applicants for enlistments, water supply, sewer and fire-alarm systems, fire apparatus, roads, walks, wharves, drainage, dredging channels, purchase of water, disposal of sewage, shooting galleries, ranges for small-arms target practice, field, mobile, and railway artillery practice, including flour for paste for marking targets, such ranges and galleries to be open as far as practicable to the National Guard and organized rifle clubs under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, for furnishing heat and light for the authorized allowance of quarters for officers, enlisted men, and warrant officers, including retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, contract surgeons when stationed at and occupying public quarters at military posts, officers of the National Guard attending service and garrison schools, and for recruits, guards, hospitals, storehouses, offices, the buildings erected at private cost, in the operation of the act approved May 31, 1902 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 1346), and buildings for a similar purpose on military reservations authorized by War Department regulations; for sale of fuel to officers; fuel and engine supplies required in the operation of modern batteries at established posts, $13,595,017, of which $2,500,000 shall be available immediately for the procurement and transportation of fuel for the service of the fiscal year 1933: Provided, That not more than $16,000 of the appropriations contained in this act shall be available for rent of offices outside the District of Columbia in connection with work incident to the assurance of adequate provision for the mobilization of matériel and industrial organizations essential to war-time needs: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be available for the rental of offices, garages, and stables for military attachés: Provided further, That no part of the funds herein appropriated shall be available for construction of a permanent nature of an additional building or an extension or addition to an existing building, the cost of which in any case exceeds $20,000: Provided further, That the monthly rental rate to be paid out of this appropriation for stabling any animal shall not exceed $15: Provided further, That no property shall be leased by the Secretary of War under authority of the act of July 28, 1892 (U. S. C., title 40, sec. 303), as amended, for a consideration involving an expenditure for repairs, alterations, or improvements in excess of 15 per cent of the total annual rental for such property.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the language on page 29, lines 9 to 14, inclusive, that it is legislation on an appropriation bill and also proposes legislation regarding revenues and not expenditures.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. GOSS. Yes; I reserve it.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, this proposition was called to the committee's attention by the General Accounting Office in a memorandum dated January 19, 1932. Unless this provision be adopted, the Congress will continue to have no control over the character of repairs, improvements, and additions that may be made to Government property. We felt that under such circumstances the provision ought to be carried. It is a matter relatively so trifling that I should think the Committee on Military Affairs would not wish to devote its time to. I have talked with several members of the Military Affairs Committee about it, and they think it is a very wise limitation and one that ought to be included in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. GOSS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly inform us as to the basis for the limitation of 15 per cent of the rental? Suppose the rental of a piece of property was $500, all the department could use for repairs on that property would be $75.

Mr. COLLINS. We use the rate carried in the Treasury Department bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. It seems to be a rather small sum when perhaps the additions might require an expenditure of $200, yet they would have to come to Congress for authorization to put the property in rentable condition. I am directing my inquiry largely to the ratable amount you fix as the ban above which the Secretary of War may not expend money for repairs on the property.

Mr. COLLINS. The Treasury Department bill carries a somewhat similar provision and provides a limitation of 15 per cent of the annual rental, and we are just following the Treasury Department provision.

Mr. STAFFORD. There might be one rule properly applicable to one department where the rentals may be very large and the same rule would work an injustice as to another department where the rentals were much smaller.

Mr. COLLINS. We say 15 per cent, because, as I already have stated, that rate has had the approval of the Congress in a similar case.

Mr. GOSS. But there is a difference in this connection with respect to the War Department. These funds would go into the miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury Department under this provision, whereas if the proviso were left out, all these funds would be available for the use of the War Department under "funds unappropriated."

Mr. COLLINS. I think the gentleman misconceives the purpose of this provision. The purpose is to prohibit the War Department from leasing buildings for a consideration that the lessees shall keep the buildings in repair. That is the sole purpose of it, and we think it is a very salutary provision.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, the condition set out in the query which I propounded would be met by the fact that the lease could provide that the lessee should keep the premises in repair rather than the Government.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. On the other hand, if this provision be adopted, these funds would go into miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury, whereas if the proviso were not in the bill, they would be retained for the use of the Army or the War Department. Is not that true?

Mr. COLLINS. I do not think so.

Mr. GOSS. Certainly, under this provision they would go into miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in the language of the proviso that changes the direction of the rentals.

Mr. GOSS. That is provided for in the law. This proviso changes the act of July 28, 1892.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, all this provision seeks to do is to forbid the department from exceeding the amount of 15 per cent of the rentals in the way of repairs; and I think, after the explanation made by the gentleman from Mississippi, it is a commendable provision.

Mr. COLLINS. That is all it does.

Mr. STAFFORD. And I hope the gentleman from Connecticut will not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. GOSS. It is an arbitrary limitation of 15 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. As the gentleman well knows, we often lease property and put the burden of repairs upon the lessee.

Mr. GOSS. This may affect those $50,000,000 docks of the Army in New York City, and the gentleman well knows that those piers are very expensive and there are some buildings on the piers, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. And the way they have leased some of the buildings in the past, if they should go ahead and lease these piers in the same way, with this 15 per cent limitation, which is arbitrary, on a $50,000,000 proposition, it would not seem to me to be a wise proposal.

Mr. STAFFORD. That 15 per cent would give the War Department a leeway of $7,500,000 for repairs on a $50,000,000 valuation. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order because I can see that this is a protective provision for the best interests of the Government.

Mr. GOSS. I do not look at it in that way. It seems to me it throws the money back into miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury and does not make the money available for the War Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the gentleman is entirely in error on that proposition.

Mr. GOSS. Where does it say otherwise?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in the proviso that changes the disposition of the rentals. It just seeks to put a limitation of 15 per cent on the amount that may be paid for repairs.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Referring to the act of 1892——

Mr. GOSS. As I understand the law, as construed by the Comptroller General, all cash receipts from the rental of Government-owned structures must be deposited to the credit of miscellaneous receipts.

Expenditures necessary for the maintenance and repair of the leased property, even necessitated solely by the existence of the lease, must thus be borne by appropriations for the support of the Army. Under the law as thus construed the only course which the Army can follow in justice to its own activities is to require that the lessee as a part of his rental obligation bear the cost of the maintenance and repair of the property leased. Any arbitrary limitation, such as the 15 per cent proposed, can not be intelligently applied to specific cases which may arise in the future. Each case must be determined on its merits, and the administrative authorities should not be thus hampered in the exercise of a wise discretion.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The War Department and the Navy Department are seeking in premeditated fashion to relieve themselves from the scrutiny of the Comptroller General. The Comptroller General is the agent of Congress to protect the interests of the Government. I am not surprised that the War and Navy Departments are trying to get from under the protecting wing of the Comptroller General at the expense of the Treasury and the taxpayers.

Mr. GOSS. Can the gentleman give any reason why it should be 15 per cent instead of 10 per cent or 5 per cent?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Mississippi has explained the division of expenses, and it is true that the amount that would be needed for repairs will be taken from the Army fund.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order, and I ask unanimous consent to put in the memorandum from the comptroller.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order; and without objection, the request of the gentleman from Mississippi is granted.

The memorandum follows:

MEMORANDUM

JANUARY 19, 1932.

The leasing of public buildings to private parties at times is now in consideration that the private parties expend the value of the rental to make repairs, improvements, or additions to said public buildings, and this procedure has been supported by an opinion of the Attorney General of June 12, 1930.

The Congress clearly loses its control over the character of the repairs, improvements, and additions that may be so made, the practice referred to enabling the administrative departments to obtain such work upon the structures without limitation of the amount expended thereon and without the prior approval and consideration of the Congress as appears to have been intended by the provisions of section 3733 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and it likewise conflicts with the provisions of sections 3617 and 3618 of the Revised Statutes that the gross amount of all moneys received from whatever source for the use of the United States shall be paid into the Treasury without deduction.

There appears some authority for the practice in so far as the War Department is concerned, by reason of the provisions of the act of July 28, 1892 (27 Stat. 321), which provides:

"That authority be, and is hereby, given to the Secretary of War, when in his discretion it will be for the public good, to lease, for a period not exceeding five years and revocable at any time, such property of the United States under his control as may not for the time be required for public use and for the leasing of which there is no authority under existing law, and such leases shall be reported annually to Congress: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be held to apply to mineral or phosphate lands."

There appears nothing in this enactment expressly authorizing or permitting the leasing of property of the United States to be otherwise than for a money consideration, particularly taken in consideration with the provisions of the Revised Statutes cited. So also the Supreme Court of the United States determined in the case of Pan American Co. v. United States (257 U. S. 456, 510), where a former Secretary of the Navy attempted to trade crude oil for tank structures, etc., to be erected in Hawaii, that there was no authority for such trade and that sections 3617 and 3618 of the Revised Statutes required the crude oil to be sold and the proceeds deposited in the Treasury.

It is reported that there are many such leases and thus comparatively large sums of money may be expended in the form of rentals for repairs, etc., of public buildings, over which Congress has no control as to the character or extent of the repairs.

An extension of this practice appears to have been involved in bill S. 4103, Seventy-first Congress, second session. (See also H. Rept. No. 1772 on S. 4108.)

There appears no question that proper administration of the properties of the United States would require that the rentals be in the form of cash and be deposited in the Treasury for appropriation by Congress on estimates showing the necessity, character, and extent of the repairs, etc., proposed to be made and as contemplated by the provisions of section 3733, Revised Statutes.

At the least, there should be a control by the Congress over the amount permitted to be expended on such repairs similar to the control Congress has exercised in connection with the leasing by the Treasury Department of buildings on sites not immediately required for Government uses—such as provided for in the appropriation act for the Treasury Department for repairs of public buildings—that the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year shall not "exceed 15 per cent of the annual rentals of such buildings" (fiscal year 1932, act of February 23, 1931, 46 Stat. 1231), and to obtain such control by the Congress and a limitation or restriction upon expending the rentals for repairs, etc., legislative enactment in the form of a provision to some pending bill should be as follows:

Hereafter no property shall be leased by the Secretary of War under authority of the act of July 28, 1892 (27 Stat. 321), for a consideration involving an expenditure for repairs, alterations, or improvements in excess of 15 per cent of the total annual rental for such property.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rakes, shovels, and brooms; repairs to roadway, pavements, macadam, and asphalt block; repairs to street crossings; repairs to street drains, and labor for cleaning roads, $8,469; for two-thirds of said sum, to be supplied by the United States, $5,646.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend in line 15, page 29, by striking out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. COLLINS: Page 29, beginning at line 15, strike out the paragraph ending in line 22.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in the expenditure of appropriations in this act the Secretary of War shall, unless in his discretion the interest of the Government will not permit, purchase or contract for, within the limits of the United States, only articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States, notwithstanding that such articles of the growth, production, or manufacure of the United States may cost more, if such excess of cost be not unreasonable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice in this paragraph and the one preceding there is a difference in the amount of contribution. In the first paragraph it is one-third, and in the one under consideration two-thirds. I notice further that the gentleman has gone into detail as to what these appropriations may be used for. It refers to brooms and shovels, and so forth. Will the gentleman satisfy my curiosity by stating why that difference in the contribution?

Mr. COLLINS. That is all in accordance with the contract between the War Department and private users. We carry the amount that has been agreed to. The language has been carried in its present form for a number of years.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it is the same contract, and in one instance it is one-third and the other instance two-thirds——

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman is asking me the same question that I raised in the committee. They advised me that the division of the cost is entirely fair.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, with that illuminating statement by the gentleman from Mississippi, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For creating, maintaining, and operating at established flying schools and balloon schools courses of instruction for officers, students, and enlisted men, including cost of equipment and supplies necessary for instruction, purchase of tools, equipment, materials, machines, textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, instruments, and materials for theoretical and practical instruction; for maintenance, repair, storage, and operation of airships, war balloons, and other aerial machines, including instruments, materials, gas plants, hangars, and repair shops, and appliances of every sort and description necessary for the operation, construction, or equipment of all types of aircraft, and all necessary spare parts and equipment connected therewith and the establishment of landing and take-off runways; for purchase of supplies for securing, developing, printing, and reproducing photographs in connection with aerial photography; improvement, equipment, maintenance, and operation of plants for testing and experimental work, and procuring and introducing water, electric light and power, gas, and sewerage, including maintenance, operation, and repair of such utilities at such plants; for the procurement of helium gas; salaries and wages of civilian employees as may be necessary; transportation of materials in connection with consolidation of Air Corps activities; experimental investigation and purchase and development of new types of aircraft accessories thereto, and aviation engines, including plans, drawings, and specifications thereof, and the purchase of letters patent, applications for letters patent, licenses under letters patent and applications for letters patent; for the purchase, manufacture, and construction of airships, balloons, and other aerial machines, including instruments, gas plants, and appliances of every sort and destription necessary for the operation, construction, or equipment of all types of aircraft, and all necessary spare parts and equipment connected therewith; for the marking of military airways where the purchase of land is not involved; for the purchase, manufacture, and issue of special clothing, wearing apparel, and similar equipment for aviation purposes; for all necessary expenses connected with the sale or disposal of surplus or obsolete aeronautical equipment, and the rental of buildings, and other facilities for the handling or storage of such equipment; for the services of not more than four consulting engineers at experimental stations of the Air Corps as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, at rates of pay to be fixed by him not to exceed $50 a day for not exceeding 50 days each and necessary traveling expenses; purchase of special apparatus and appliances, repairs and replacements of same used in connection with special scientific medical research in the Air Corps; for maintenance and operation of such Air Corps printing plants outside of the District of Columbia as may be authorized in accordance with law; for publications, station libraries, special furniture, supplies and equipment for offices, shops, and laboratories; for special services, including the salvaging of wrecked aircraft, $25,307,816: Provided, That not to exceed $3,593,314 from this appropriation may be expended for pay of civilian employees other than those employed in experimental and research work; not exceeding $9,000 may be expended for the procurement of helium from the Bureau of Mines, of which sum such amounts as may be required may be transferred in advance to that bureau; not exceeding $2,824,397 may be expended for experimental and research work with airplanes or lighter-than-air craft and their equipment, including the pay of necessary civilian employees; not exceeding $100 may be expended for the production of lighter-than-air equipment; not less than $11,525,728 shall be expended for the production or purchase of new airplanes and their equipment, spare parts, and accessories, of which $9,017,152 shall be available exclusively for combat airplanes, their equipment, spare parts, and accessories; not less than $5,924,010 shall be expended, other than for pay of civilian employees, for aviation fuel and oil and for the repair and maintenance of airplanes and their equipment, spare parts, and accessories; and not more than $6,000 may be expended for settlement of claims (not exceeding $250 each) for damages to persons and private property resulting from the operation of aircraft at home and abroad when each claim is substantiated by a survey report of a board of officers appointed by the commanding officer of the nearest aviation post and approved by the Chief of Air Corps and the Secretary of War: Provided further, That the sum of $193,872 of the appropriation for Air Corps, Army, fiscal year 1929, and the sum of $158,455 of the appropriation for Air Corps, Army, fiscal year 1930, shall remain available until June 30, 1933, for the payment of obligations incurred under contracts executed prior to July 1, 1929, and July 1, 1930, respectively: Provided further, That none of the money appropriated in this act shall be used for the purchase of any airplane ordered after the approval of this act which is equipped or propelled by a Liberty motor or by any motor or airplane engine purchased or constructed prior to July 1, 1920.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COLLINS: Page 34, line 20, after the word "aircraft" insert a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I have two other amendments which I offer, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. COLLINS: Page 36, line 1, strike out "$3,593,314" and insert "$3,728,401," and in line 7, strike out "$2,824,397" and insert "$2,813,077."

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, in pooling all travel items into one appropriation, we made the deduction from the Air Corps appropriation entirely from one subhead. The Chief of the Air Corps says the deduction should have been distributed. These two amendments are necessary to comply with his wishes. The total appropriation remains the same.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood that the gentleman's first amendment increased the appropriation about $130,000.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; because we took it all off at that particular place, but the total amount transferred to the pooled item for travel will remain the same as originally proposed.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I notice on page 36, line 3, the language, referring to the appropriation, that not to exceed $3,593,314 of the appropriation may be expended for pay of civilian employees other than those employed in experimental and research work. The gentleman knows that at Langley Field the Government is appropriating more than a million dollars for experimental and research work in construction of aircraft. I am wondering what relation this appropriation has to that, if any, or whether the amount carried here for that work is in addition to the million dollars or more the Government is expending for this Bureau of Aeronautics, which is a national research institution, and yet one of the separate bureaus of the Government.

Mr. COLLINS. A part of this money is expended for similar purposes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. How much do they expend down there? The Budget carries more than a million for that separate bureau, but I understand some money is expended by the manufacturers of aircraft. Nevertheless the Government is expending more than a million dollars.

Mr. COLLINS. The Army and the Navy both formerly allotted funds for experimentation by that activity. I understand that now, however, they give no financial aid.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But besides appropriating a million dollars plus for that separate bureau, the National Aeronautics Bureau, or whatever the name is, we are carrying an appropriation in the Army appropriation bill and in the Navy appropriation bill.

Mr. COLLINS. That is correct.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Can the gentleman give me the total amount that Congress is expending for experimental research work at Langley Field?

Mr. COLLINS. No; I have not the figures at hand.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The reason I interrupted the gentleman—and I do not want to take up the time of the committee unnecessarily—is that the question came up in our Committee on Economy as to whether or not we would discontinue the appropriation for this bureau, which has its set-up at Langley Field. The suggestion came to us that we were appropriating only a million plus in the Independent Offices bill, and now we find that in addition to that sum, the Army bill carries a similar appropriation for such work, and evidently a goodly sum, and the Navy does likewise. If the Navy and the Army both are expending money and the Government also appropriating for this bureau, it seems to me we are carrying too much money for that institution at Langley Field. Apparently we are expending $6,000,000 for experimentation in aircraft construction which is a very large sum.

Mr. COLLINS. My information is that this activity at Langley Field is doing some very excellent work and both the Army and the Navy lean rather heavily upon it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. And it is leaning rather heavily upon the Treasury.

Mr. COLLINS. We have been very liberal in providing for experimental and research work in aeronautical development.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I am wondering if the manufacturers of these planes for the Army and the Navy could not do a little supporting themselves rather than put the whole burden on the Treasury. They sell the planes. It is true that tests are made down there, but we do not need this much money to make tests.

Mr. COLLINS. We passed a law back in 1926 that very largely is responsible for placing most of the burden upon the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. One of the reasons for my favoring the merger of the Army and the Navy Departments was, as I stated on the floor, because there could be savings to a considerable extent in the air force.

Mr. COLLINS. Including experimentation?

Mr. STAFFORD. In all experimentation work. The Navy maintains a very large plant at South Philadelphia near League Island Navy Yard, and the Army maintains a very large experiment station at McCook Field at Dayton, Ohio.

The distinguished chairman of the Economy Committee points out the experimentation at Langley Field. The Marine Corps experimentation at Quantico and other instances might be stated. I would like to inquire whether the gentleman has any information as to just the amount of money that is being used by the War Department for these respective experimentations, where a saving could be had if there was consolidation.

Mr. COLLINS. I could not give the gentleman offhand the total amount carried in this bill for experimentation of various kinds. I will say that the only experimentation item eliminated by the committee had to do with experimentation on certain types of automobiles that we felt the trade could do better than the War Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question about that.

Mr. COLLINS. That is the only item of experimentation that was eliminated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Everyone knows that the automotive industry in Detroit has the most perfect plants for experimentation.

Mr. COLLINS. We carried all the other items of experimentation, and they run into very large sums.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to give one other reason why I advocated a merger of the departments, because I believed a saving could be made in the amount of $100,000. What is the cost of the maintenance of the proving ground at Aberdeen? That is a large plant which was acquired during the war, many thousands of acres, to test our cannons, where they had a range of more than 30 miles.

Shortly afterwards, when the Navy Department found that the War Department had acquired this modern proving ground, they thought they must have a similar proving ground, and they secured an extensive tract of land on the Potomac for the same purpose, when the Army proving ground at Aberdeen could have been utilized, without any conflict of service at all—another instance justifying the superb recommendation of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Has the gentleman any information about that?

Mr. COLLINS. It would be difficult to assemble information as to the total expenditure at the Army proving ground. We have no report that we can turn to, that would show the combined expenditures, like, for example, the annual report of the Paymaster General of the Navy.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's statement would imply that the Army has ancient and obsolete accounting methods, whereas the Navy has up-to-date accounting methods.

Mr. COLLINS. Well, I would not say that.

Mr. STAFFORD. But if direct inquiry were made of the responsible person in the War Department, that information could be obtained without question?

Mr. COLLINS. I should think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I would like to call the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee to line 17, page 34. Last year the language carried was "and payment of their travel and necessary expenses as authorized by existing law."

Where is that found regarding the Air Corps this year?

Mr. COLLINS. The language is in the pooled appropriation for travel, or at least the money is there.

Mr. JAMES. What page?

Mr. COLLINS. We have passed that, I will say to the gentleman. The language to which the gentleman is referring will be found on page 14. We have passed the item.

Mr. JAMES. That is the reason it was left out regarding the Signal Corps and other branches also?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes. It is all in that one paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill about one moss-covered item that appears on page 37, the last proviso. I remember the old controversy years ago, in regard to the Liberty motor, and I suppose that having been put into the bill at that time it is still necessary and will continue to the end of the chapter.

Mr. COLLINS. It was put in by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. TILSON. And it is still necessary, is it, and if so, how long is it expected that it must be carried?

Mr. COLLINS. There are certain of those airplane engines still on hand.

Mr. TILSON. They must be in the junk shop.

Mr. COLLINS. No. On page 1002 of the hearings we find the total on hand, all types, 6,289. We had an opportunity to sell them to Soviet Russia, or a large part of them, and there was such a hue and cry raised against it that the Government would not sell them, with the result that we have them on hand now, practically of no value, instead of Soviet Russia.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. Why do we use those old motors in the Christie tanks?

Mr. TILSON. I suppose they are not so dangerous if they are used in a tank on the ground.

Mr. COLLINS. It is an excellent motor, I understand, but, of course, does not compare with aviation motors of recent design. It undoubtedly has been found to be adaptable for use in tanks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last line.

I have made some remarks on one or two occasions about the cost of printing. These are times when we ought to know something about the cost of things that we purchase before we purchase them.

I think it might interest this committee to know what it has cost to produce the hearings we have had on the War Department appropriation bill. I doubt whether there are three Members of the House of Representatives or men around the Capitol who know anything about what that book cost after it was produced or before, so I have asked the Public Printer to give me an estimate of what he has charged Congress for this particular book.

There are 1,522 pages in the books. They cost $15,976. That does not include the cost for the reporting, and about $1 a page should be added, as the reporting of the hearings cost from a dollar to a dollar and a half a page, so that these hearings which I hold in my hand cost $17,500 plus.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That applies to practically every committee in the House.

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The cost of printing and binding, it seems to me, ought to have the attention of this House.

There is a legislative committee which has spent quite as much or more, at least as much as the sum mentioned by the gentleman from Colorado, already on hearings that have been held during this session, one committee. It seems to me there ought to be somebody who would supervise, we will say, that is a better word, or restrict the publication of hearings such as those.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. How many copies of this hearing were printed, altogether?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. I can tell the gentleman. Seven hundred copies were printed.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Seven hundred copies. It seems to me that is just twice as many as we need. At the end of each year the Public Printer has to throw away or sell for junk a quarter of a million dollars' worth of material like this.

Mr. BARBOUR. No; he does not sell material like this. The supply of Appropriation Committee hearings is exhausted each year.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Colorado yield to me for a minute?

Mr. HARDY. I yield.

Mr. BARBOUR. The activities of the War Department cover a very broad field; and if you go into them in any detail or with any care and have printed hearings, it is bound to take up quite a number of printed pages. While these hearings might be reduced in size, I do not think the gentleman will say, if he will look them over, there has been any very great extravagance, if there has been any, in the printed hearings.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I wonder what the House would say if the subcommittee which spent weeks and months investigating the various phases of this subject had failed to print their hearings for the information of the House?

Mr. BARBOUR. Time and again the chairman of the subcommittee is asked questions by the Members who want information, and he furnishes it out of the hearings. That is the official information.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Has not the complaint been rather that hearings have not been available to Members in sufficient time, that they have not been published quickly enough?

Mr. BARBOUR. I do not know about that.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HARDY. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. After the book is in type the additional number of copies do not cost very much.

Mr. HARDY. No; it is the number of pages that cost.

Mr. HASTINGS. So, to cut the number down from 700 to 350 would not result in much saving.

Mr. HARDY. No; not very much. The point I am directing attention to is what it costs to do things. I am not finding any fault with any particular pages in the hearing, although I would not be surprised if we could get out a very complete set of hearings with a less number of pages than are contained in this. I want to make note of the fact that it costs $10 a page for the printing of these hearings, and, as the gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the Economy Committee says, the legislative committees produce as many volumes as the Subcommittees on Appropriations. It costs so much a page, and the men who have charge of handling these hearings ought to consider a little whether it is going to be worth $10 a page before they let a lot of stuff go into a hearing.

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is it exactly, and that is what I tried to say. I hope it will not be taken that I made this suggestion to the committee from any superiority of knowledge or judgment about what the committee should do. It was merely a suggestion on my part, and I hope the committee do not think I am in here to tell them how to run their own business. They ought to know it better than I do.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I have sat on committees and have noticed page after page of figures put in that I am quite sure very few people, if any, ever take the trouble to scan. A set of tables and figures costs $21 a page, and when it is stretched out in long strings like this it may cost $50 or $60 a sheet.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. GLOVER. I heartily agree with the gentleman. I do not think there is a greater abuse being carried on in this House than that which is carried on in that way. Very recently a matter came up before a committee of which I am a member, and was referred to me. I reported that to carry out the purposes of the bill would cost $30,000 or $50,000, and that after we got it it would be worth but very little. My suggestion is that this House ought to exercise some control over this, and it can do it. We should have a rule requiring that hearings may be held but not printed unless this House authorizes the printing of them. When you leave it to every committee, and everyone conducting hearings, you will have a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars merely for printing.

Mr. SNELL. How much does the gentleman think it would cost to have the House take the time to authorize those things?

Mr. GLOVER. We could have a rule providing that the House should authorize the printing of hearings before any money was spent on printing. The House should have a rule requiring such authorization, and it can not be done in any other way.

Mr. SNELL. You would have to have an authorization from the committee itself, and that would take more time than it would to print the hearings.

Mr. GLOVER. Does the gentleman say this House is helpless and could maintain no control over a proposition of this kind?

Mr. HARDY. The chairman of committees could save a great deal of money if they would use a little bit of thought about what the cost will be.

Mr. GLOVER. I am suggesting a way whereby you can control that.

Mr. HARDY. Until recently they had no idea what it was costing, and I am trying to show how large the cost is.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Unless the membership has access to the evidence that comes before our committees, so it can pass upon legislation based upon hearings, you would have legislation by committees instead of legislation by the Congress. I agree with my friend that this ought to be curtailed, and it is within the province, within the jurisdiction, and within the power of committee chairmen and chairmen of subcommittees to control it. I think they are doing their best now to control it. But we do not ever want to get to the point where we have to depend upon committees for information. Every Member of the House ought to have access to every hearing on every bill.

Mr. HARDY. Surely, within reasonable bounds. I might say that the revenue bill recently brought in here, the hearings cost $11,558. The hearings on the tariff bill which the Senate and the House held a year or so ago, together with the bills that were printed, cost $430,000. It might interest you to know about the cost of printing the bills which are introduced by Members. As you know, many times bills are introduced out of courtesy. A little 2-page bill—which the introducer knows will never get anywhere except back to his constituents—costs $11.50 to print, and a 50-page bill about $259, more than $5 a page. I am not finding fault with any individual chairman. I am merely suggesting that those who have charge of this matter weigh what it will cost for printing before they order it done. If they would stop to give a little thought to it, a great deal of money could be saved. Last year the printed hearings for the Senate cost $287,674.97, for the House, $316,979.08, a total of $604,654.05.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is a member of the Appropriations Committee. He knows that his committee, under the guidance of our good friend from Tennessee [JOE BYRNS] has already cut appropriation bills $161,000,000, and we are still cutting. Unless you have hearings to back up everything that that committee does and enable you to give the membership a good reason for doing it, you will find the membership coming in here and tearing the bill all to pieces and all of the savings will be cast to the winds. If the gentleman from Tennessee, with the help of my friend and other members of his committee, can save this Government $161,000,000 on the supply bills, what is a little $10,000 printing bill compared with that?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. What the gentleman from Texas says is only partially true. A great deal of the time of committees, both legislative and appropriation, is taken up in listening to people who want money appropriated and a great many of the pages of the hearings are taken up by arguments as to why more money should be appropriated.

Mr. BLANTON. My idea is to cut them right off at the cutting-off place.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, in these particular hearings the only matter in them about which I was in doubt as to printing pertain to the housing of the Army. We had authorized appropriations from time to time in the past involving a total expenditure of $72,127,789 for the housing of the United States Army. This year's bill carries practically the last appropriation necessary to finish that program as authorized to date. The committee felt, even though it was entirely statistical and its cost would be heavier than the cost of ordinary reading matter, that Members of the House and the general public ought to have the information as to how and where the $72,000,000 plus had been expended.

This policy would seem to be necessary if the Congress is to function properly. I will be candid and say I do not know of any place where the hearings on this bill could have been shortened in the development of the facts upon which the committee acted and upon which the House very largely must be guided. If the Congress does not care to have available to it the facts upon which the committee acts, then we should not publish the hearings. My own judgment is that the Members of this House ought to have all the facts before them in order that they properly may perform their duties upon the floor of this House as they are expected to by the people of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two lines.

Discussions of the kind we have had in the last few moments are all very interesting. They show a determination and an anxiety on the part of the membership of the House to respond to the country-wide demand for retrenchment of expenditures, but these little parings and cuts of appropriations of the character we have been discussing in the last few moments will not satisfy the people. The people want a permanent reduction in the expenditures of the Federal Government which can only be secured, in my opinion, by the elimination of many of the activities in which the Federal Government is now engaged.

We give $250,000,000 a year to the States in direct appropriations of money to help them in activities which they are very loath to conduct without the assistance of the Federal Government. We give a further $15,000,000 per annum for cooperation with the States in activities that the States ought to perform. We have an enormous Department of Agriculture which does not perform any work for any territory within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, but which is giving assistance to the States and Territories and possessions in work which those States and Territories and possessions should conduct themselves.

I made a detailed statement on this subject in the House on March 15 last.

We are conducting numerous enterprises through bureaus and commissions as well as Cabinet departments which are not governmental or Federal in character. They are not within the purposes for which the Federal Government was established. They are not within the purposes enumerated in the Federal Constitution for the operation of the Federal Government.

The appropriation bill now before us represents a genuine Federal enterprise. National defense is one of the things directly committed to the Congress, and there are some others; but I rise to say that we will not satisfy the great demand out among the people to-day for retrenchment by small cuts and little parings here and there. We are not going to accomplish what the people want until we take hold of the entire structure of the National Government, the entire operations of the Federal administration and begin to find the things that are not properly within the scope of the Federal Government, and begin to divorce the Federal Government from those operations and from those activities.

Of course, it looks as if this cost of printing is enormous. I do not know just how much we could save. I do know that the people in the country are sending requests to us constantly for documents and for other printed material. They want to know, and have a right to know, something about the activities of the Government and the purposes and manner in which their tax payments are expended. I have risen largely to express my own personal view that if we want to satisfy the demand in the country to-day, which is coming to us at our desks every day in hundreds and thousands of letters and telegrams, we are not going to accomplish it by a reduction of a few million dollars here and there. The people want reduction by wholesale and we can not get this except by changing the entire structure of Federal operations, and limiting those operations to the things which, distinctly and directly, are connected with the Federal Government under the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think we have all been interested in the endeavor here to-day to disseminate some knowledge among the people of what it costs the Government to have these hearings printed. A subject somewhat more germane to the War Department appropriation bill, however, are certain activities of the Seventy-first Congress which, in some particulars, are somewhat amusing to me in the face of the fact that we have been laboring here for the last four or five months trying to balance the Budget.

I quite agree with the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HARDY] that much money could be saved in the printing of hearings, but I wonder have we taken into consideration that in the face of the fact that money has already been appropriated and spent on certain public works in certain Army posts, no moneys are now available for completing those projects.

I have in mind particularly the post in my district, Selfridge Field, where there is a piece of hard-surface road. Within the last year aprons and certain runways have been completed, ditches dug, sewers installed, grading has been done, and shoulders constructed, so that at the present time the old roadway is about 6 inches below the shoulders of the road. It is a constant menace to traffic, and it will only cost about $25,000 to resurface the road and put it in good condition, and thereby save thousands of dollars which have been so far invested in building this road. Much of this work will have to be done over if the resurfacing is not done this summer.

In the face of that situation, we have no money available to complete it. I am told that an amendment to this bill providing funds for this project will not be in order. I read in the press of last evening that the Government, in the face of our activity to balance the Budget, is handing out directly to the State of Maryland—and I like Maryland, but I think I owe a duty to my country to maintain an adequate national defense—I find that the Federal Government is donating to the State of Maryland $130,000 for the improvement of the Maryland valleys adjacent to the District line.

I ask you whether it is common sense to spend large sums of money for beautifying the city of Washington and the State of Maryland in preference to protecting our investment in Selfridge Field, which is a part of our national defense? It is somewhat ridiculous to talk about retrenchment, to talk about economy, to talk about balancing the Budget, in the face of the fact that this Government is making donations to projects which, you will admit, are not worthy of Federal aid at this particular time.

I believe we have changed our policy since the Seventy-first Congress. At that time you gentlemen who were here spent many million dollars for public works, based on the theory that that money would aid employment. You went to extremes in maintaining that policy which was presumed to be the result of sound reasoning, but at this session of Congress you have changed that policy and have gone to the other extreme of economy and retrenchment in governmental activities to the extent that your "economy complex" may result in irreparable injury to the Nation.

If we can afford to spend millions of dollars in beautifying the District of Columbia and adjacent territory, it seems to me that it is sound business to invest at least a like amount in maintaining our national defense units in proportion to our needs. It is just a question whether we will substitute airplanes and equipment necessary to an adequate air force for a few more flowers and shrubs in Rock Creek Park.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For manufacture, procurement, storage and issue, including research, planning, design, development, inspection, test, alteration, maintenance, repair, and handling of ordnance material together with the machinery, supplies, and services necessary thereto; for supplies and services in connection with the general work of the Ordnance Department, comprising police and office duties, rents, tolls, fuel, light, water, advertising, stationery, typewriting and computing machines, including their exchange, and furniture, tools, and instruments of service; to provide for training and other incidental expenses of the ordnance service; for instruction purposes, other than tuition; for maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn freight and passenger-carrying vehicles; for ammunition for military salutes at Government establishments, and institutions to which the issues of arms for salutes are authorized; for services, material, tools, and appliances for operation of the testing machines and chemical laboratory in connection therewith; for publications for libraries of the Ordnance Department, including the Ordnance office, including subscriptions to periodicals; for services of not more than four consulting engineers as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, at rates of pay to be fixed by him not to exceed $50 per day for not exceeding 50 days each, $9,805,734: Provided, That $200,000 of this appropriation shall be available exclusively for the purchase of five convertible armored tanks.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, line 9, strike out all after the figures "$9,805,734," down to and including the word "tanks" in line 11.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, this proviso would require the expenditure of $200,000 of this appropriation exclusively for the purchase of five convertible armored tanks. The War Department has not at this time concluded the tests of tanks of this description. It is doubtful as to whether the appropriation should be spent for tanks of this design. Furthermore, it requires the purchase of a private manufacturer, whereas such tanks, or those of another type more suitable for the service, could be more economically manufactured at the Government arsenal.

Major General Hof, Chief of Ordnance, furnished the following information:

The three Christie tanks have been at Fort Benning, Ga., prior to May 4, 1932, an average of 69 days each, during which time they have been out of service under repair an average of 21 days each.

The repair on these tanks during the period has cost an average of $340.61 for new parts, and, in addition, an average of 387 man-hours of skilled repairmen.

They were, on May 7, all unserviceable for want of further repairs, the estimated cost of which is still undetermined.

I hope the chairman of the committee, Mr. COLLINS, will agree with me in this amendment and not insist on purchasing $200,000 worth of tanks of a type that is not approved by the Ordnance Department. There is nothing in the hearings that indicates that anyone connected with the War Department is in favor of this particular make of tank. We have arsenals in this country to manufacture these armored tanks. They are making experiments, and there is no good reason that I can see why there should be included in this bill an item of $200,000 to hand over to a company, without having before us evidence that that type of armored tank is superior to any that can be manufactured.

Mr. BARBOUR. The Chief of Staff says in the hearings that this tank the gentleman is referring to is the finest thing of its kind in the world.

Mr. ALLEN. Where did he say that?

Mr. BARBOUR. He made that statement before the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. Let me read from page 619 of the hearings what General Hof said.

Mr. BARBOUR. I am talking about the Chief of Staff.

Mr. ALLEN. I read from the hearings:

Mr. COLLINS. General, in that list I notice there is an item of $200,000 for tanks. Will that be for the Christie tank?

General HOF. It will be for whatever tank the War Department decides is the proper thing to spend it for, of that type. We had been thinking of manufacturing them in the arsenal rather than buying them from Christie.

Mr. COLLINS. That will be left up to the War Department?

General HOF. Yes, sir. We have a car that we have made, which has gone to the proving ground this week.

That is all that I am asking for in this amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. General Hof is the Chief of Ordnance?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. This Government has its own arsenals, and they can make these tanks in the arsenals. It does not look right in these times to include in this bill an item of $200,000 to hand over to a manufacturer, with evidence before us that the type of tank is not satisfactory to the War Department.

Mr. JACOBSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSEN. I think the arsenals should be used for this work. Hundreds of millions of dollars are invested in this equipment and buildings, but that is the smallest part of it. In every one of the arsenals men are employed who are looking for work. Just now we are taking up in the different departments provision for relief work and it is proposed to spend $500,000,000 for relief. Why not start in with these men and take care of their own families? These men that live and work in the arsenals are men of our own families.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, a perfecting amendment, which I ask to be read at this time, so that this can all be discussed at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLAGUE: Page 43, line 11, strike out the words "purchase of five convertible armored tanks" and insert in lieu thereof "procurement of five armored tanks."

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, this spring seven armored tanks were purchased. These tanks have not as yet been given a thorough test. The Chief of Ordnance, General Hof, writes me, and in fact has told me, that during the past two weeks a test was made at Fort Benning, and three of those tanks have not been found satisfactory. His statement to me is, as follows:

Last week I was present at maneuvers at Fort Benning, where three of these tanks are located. All three were disabled before the two days' test was concluded, one before the test began, and one on each of the two succeeding days. The medium tank constructed for Ordnance Department operated without mishap and with distinction over the same terrain.

I have personally been greatly taken up with the Christie tanks. I have favored them. We have now, purchased by the department, seven of these tanks. They have not as yet been given a thorough test by the department. I realize that some of the Army officers have been very much opposed to the Christie tanks. I think undue opposition by them has been manifested. In order to be perfectly fair, to get an unbiased opinion, I called up General Fuqua, Chief of Infantry, who has charge at Fort Benning, and he tells me the tanks have not as yet been given a thorough test. He further stated that it would take at least two or three months, possibly until late this fall, before the tanks could be given a thorough test, and in his opinion it is unwise to have this provision as it is in the bill.

In other words, he thought it would be better, and he suggested that the bill be amended to provide that the $200,000 could be used to "procure five armored tanks," and then the War Department would procure either by purchase or manufacture the best available tanks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAGUE. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood from the letter of General Hof and his personal statement to the gentleman that the Government-manufactured tank had proven satisfactory, whereas the Christie tanks had fallen down, each and every one?

Mr. CLAGUE. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. What was the reference to the Government-constructed tank?

Mr. CLAGUE. He states, "The medium tank constructed by the Ordnance Department operated without mishap and with distinction over the same terrain."

Mr. STAFFORD. Whereas the Christie tanks failed in the same test, each and every one?

Mr. CLAGUE. Well, he does not put it that way.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, the facts are that they did.

Mr. BARBOUR. Oh, no; they did not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, what did the letter state?

Mr. BARBOUR. It says they passed all tests.

Mr. CLAGUE. I will read this letter again. The letter is written to me and is dated May 11, and reads as follows:

The Army appropriation bill, page 43, lines 10 and 11, provides that $200,000 of the appropriation shall be available exclusively for the purchase of convertible armored tanks. This is intended to require the purchase from Mr. Christie of tanks of his design and construction.

Seven such tanks were procured from Mr. Christie this spring and are now undergoing service test.

Last week I was present at maneuvers at Fort Benning, where three of these tanks are located. All three were disabled before the 2-day test was concluded; 1 before the test began and 1 on each of the 2 succeeding days.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do you want any more than that?

Mr. CLAGUE (continuing reading):

The medium tank constructed by the Ordnance Department operated without mishap and with distinction over the same terrain.

The proviso of lines 10 and 11 should be eliminated and the War Department will then be authorized to procure by manufacture or purchase such tanks as it deems most acceptable.

As I stated, I called up General Fuqua, and he said that the Christie tanks have not yet been given a thorough test.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLAGUE. He feels that he does not know as yet whether the faults that were found were simply minor faults that could be easily corrected, or whether the tanks were actually defective, and he felt that owing to the fact that we have seven of those tanks it would be unwise to purchase any more at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAGUE. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. As to this Government-constructed tank, how does that type compare, in a general way, with the Christie type?

Mr. CLAGUE. It is a different type of tank. As I stated a moment ago, personally I have strongly favored the Christie tank, if they could do the work. We have seven of them; they have not as yet been thoroughly tested, and I do not think it would be wise to spend $200,000 more until we can give those tanks a further test.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is this the tank that went across the Hudson River some years ago?

Mr. CLAGUE. I do not know.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAGUE. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The purpose of the amendment offered by the gentleman is simply to try out the seven; and if they are all right, next year we can buy more. Meantime not buy any. Is that it?

Mr. CLAGUE. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. And meantime Christie will be out of business.

Mr. CLAGUE. I am leaving it to the War Department.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAGUE. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. In the gentleman's amendment, he has stricken out that language "convertible," has he not?

Mr. CLAGUE. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. And the only convertible tank made is the Christie tank. Is that not true?

Mr. CLAGUE. That I do not know.

Mr. GOSS. The only convertible tank made is the one made by Christie.

Mr. BARBOUR. That is the only one I know of.

Mr. GOSS. So that the gentleman's amendment would allow the War Department to procure five armored tanks?

Mr. CLAGUE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GOSS. And not force them to purchase five convertible armored tanks?

Mr. CLAGUE. That is correct.

Mr. GOSS. So that during the period between now and the time the next appropriation bill is considered, they could not purchase any convertible tanks. I understand from the hearings on pages 619, 630, and 666, which I have before me, that the Ordnance Department has approved four of these tanks at Aberdeen and sent them on to Benning to the Infantry. Now, those have been secured on the pronounced O. K. from the ordnance standpoint at Aberdeen, but they have broken down in the practical running of them in Infantry work. I would state further, as I understand it, that they already have paid out of Government funds some $82,000 for the plans and drawings of these tanks which we own. Is that correct?

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. GOSS. So that if the Ordnance Department or the War Department decided they wanted to make some that were not convertible or were convertible, or whatever they wanted, then this appropriation would be available for the best thought in the War Department?

Mr. CLAGUE. The War Department could make their armored tanks or convertible tanks, whichever they saw fit.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAGUE. I yield.

Mr. DALLINGER. If the gentleman's amendment prevails and the Government finds it to the best interest to have tanks made in the arsenals, they can do so?

Mr. CLAGUE. They can make convertibles if they wish to after a thorough test and they are found satisfactory.

Mr. DALLINGER. That is, under the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. CLAGUE. Yes. Under my amendment.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I believe it is the duty of the members of this committee to give the House all the facts in their possession so that the House may know exactly the basis for the committee's action.

In the first place this language merely provides that $200,000 of this appropriation shall be available exclusively for the purchase of five convertible armored tanks. It does not preclude the use of other moneys for the manufacture of tanks, although we assume that the department will abide by the project estimates.

The Ordnance Department has a tank more or less copied from the Christie tank. Christie has invented a tank that the Infantry branch of the Army says is perfect. The Ordnance branch does not seem to like the tank. The Tank Corps of the Infantry is using this tank and is delighted with it. We find the Ordnance branch opposed to it. We had extensive hearings on the question last year. Some of the best tank men of the country came forward and told us it was a perfect tank and the greatest invention of its kind in existence. This year our hearings were not as complete as they were last year, but we did inquire about the tanks. Mr. Wright asked General Fuqua:

What is your estimate of that tank? What do you think about it?

General Fuqua, Chief of Infantry, replied:

My estimate is that it is the best tank produced to-day. It is the best in the world to-day.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman be fair?

Mr. COLLINS. I am fair. I am always fair, I will say to the gentleman from Connecticut. I have read him the exact language.

Mr. GOSS. Continue where it says, "However, it is shown."

Mr. COLLINS. I will ask the gentleman to read it in his own time and not mine. I have read the House the exact language. It is to be found at page 666 of the hearings exactly as I read.

Mr. GOSS. Part of it.

Mr. COLLINS. Furthermore, Mr. Wright said:

There is no other tank comparable to that tank in point of speed, is there?

General FUQUA. No, sir; not that I know of.

The testimony is that it makes 60 to 70 miles an hour on ordinary roads and from 35 to 40 miles per hour through woods and on its tracks.

Now, I do not know whether it is a good tank or a bad tank. I know the infantry says it is an excellent tank and the best in the world. I am willing to accept the kind of tank the using branch thinks is best. It seems to me the people who are going to use it in event of war ought to be the ones to decide what sort of instrument they should have. That is what actuated me and what actuated the other members of the committee in proposing this language.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is it not true that in the hearings last year the Chief of the Tank Corps and the boys who actually use the tanks came before our committee and said this is the kind they want? In other words, they let us know that if they were going to be killed, they thought they should have something to say about selecting the instrumentality that killed them.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. CLAGUE. The chairman mentioned General Fuqua. Before consenting to offer this amendment, I talked personally with General Fuqua over the phone regarding it. He stated to me to-day he thought it would be unwise to have this provision in the bill; that these tanks had not worked out satisfactorily up to this time. He said he did not know but what they could be made satisfactory, but he could not say as to that.

Mr. COLLINS. I talked to General Fuqua myself to-day.

Mr. CLAGUE. General Fuqua recommended an amendment along the lines I have suggested.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the proviso from line 9 down to and including line 11.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is pending.

Mr. GOSS. I do not understand so. The gentleman did not strike out the $200,000 in his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has an amendment pending to the same effect.

Mr. GOSS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition.

Mr. Chairman, when I interrupted the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] a few minutes ago——

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take the gentleman off his feet; but if the gentleman will permit, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, when I interrupted the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] in his reading of the information from General Fuqua I desired to call attention to the following language which he neglected to read:

However, it has shown indications of overheating, which trouble has now been corrected.

I am reading from page 666 of the hearings.

It seems that the radiator and the cooling apparatus were not sufficient to take care of the heat of the engine, caused by the increased power and speed. Now a larger radiator has been built, and the water flowing through it has been doubled—

And so on. That was some of his complaint. On page 630 of the hearings you will find that General Hof had this to say:

Well, we had some little trouble in getting those. I am hopeful. I have a little history of that situation here. Four tanks have been delivered under dates of October 9, October 10, December 8, and December 18, and we have accepted two of them.

and we have paid 75 per cent on four of them. The drawings have all been delivered, and the spare parts have not yet been delivered. The balance of the 25 per cent, which is due on the two tanks accepted, can not be paid until the spare parts are all delivered and accepted. Acceptance tests of two other tanks are now under way at Aberdeen.

Then, further, on page 631, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CLAGUE] asked General Hof in reference to these repairs which were necessary to the wheels during the test, and General Hof said:

Oh, it had to be sent back to the factory to replace the wheel, unless you have a spare wheel.

They had to send the whole tank back to the factory.

It is a hard-rubber-tired wheel. It has got to be re-tired.

I submit to the committee that inasmuch as we are restricting all appropriations for tanks this year to the extent of $200,000 and we are requiring that these be purchased from one manufacturer, we might as well name that manufacturer in the bill, and that manufacturer is Mr. Christie.

I have nothing against the Christie tank, but I say let us pause, look around, and see where this is leading us. We certainly used tanks before we bought these Christie tanks. All I am saying is why not have this money available for the purchase of armored tanks, and if these Christie tanks make good during their trial, as far as I am concerned, let us have them. We want the best, and that is all we are after.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT. The adoption of the amendment does not prevent the purchase of the Christie tank?

Mr. GOSS. Oh, yes. If the amendment is adopted it strikes out the word "convertible" and that will allow other tanks to be used until and unless we found the Christie to be the best available.

Mr. GILBERT. As I understood the gentleman from Illinois, they could use Christie tanks. Is that correct?

Mr. GOSS. Yes, they could; but it does not absolutely say to the War Department that they must buy the Christie tanks until they have had further experimentation.

Mr. GILBERT. Why should this Congress, with its limited knowledge, preclude that?

Mr. GOSS. I do not know, but the bill does preclude it, and that is why we have offered an amendment to try to straighten it out. I hope the committee will adopt the amendment. I can not understand why the gentleman from Mississippi should object to the amendment.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Is there anything in the hearings to show that tanks are available which will not overheat when running at 60 or 70 miles an hour?

Mr. GOSS. No.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Are there any other tanks available to the department?

Mr. GOSS. Other tanks are available to the War Department. There are many other brands of tanks that have been used successfully.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. TABER. The War Department now has a tank of its own which is working well.

Mr. GOSS. I understand so.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, this provision in the bill contains a principle that is more far-reaching and more important than the tanks themselves. When it comes to ordnance and implements of war I believe Congress has adopted the policy that they should be manufactured in Government arsenals. The purpose is emphasized in what the gentleman from California, unwittingly, perhaps——

Mr. BARBOUR. No.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Stated when he said that if we do not appropriate, then Christie will be out of business. That is the viciousness of the private manufacture of implements of war. In other words, appropriations must be made and public funds spent to keep manufacturers in business. That is why, as I understand it, Congress has adopted the policy that implements of war, cannon, tanks, and machine guns should be manufactured in Government arsenals, in keeping with the desire of the American people to take the profits out of war. When it comes to clothing, food, and commercial commodities, then I am strong for going into the market and buying them at competitive bidding. There is a sharp line of demarcation between munitions and armaments on one side and clothing, materials, and food on the other.

Under the Clague amendment you are not precluded from buying these tanks if they turn out to be all right; but when you take a complicated machine like a tank or an airplane that is new, it takes a long time to get what we call the "bugs" out of them. Why should we, during the period we are experimenting with the seven tanks we now have and getting the bugs out of them, encourage or direct by the wording of the provision now in the bill the buying of five more. It seems to me this would be most improvident and unwise.

Under the Clague amendment the Tank Corps can either buy five more or if they feel the Christie tank is all right they may buy that tank, but I say if the Christie tank or any other tank is successful—and, mark you, a tank can be used only for military purposes—if it is successful, then the Government ought to buy the patent, make the necessary arrangements and build them in the arsenals in order not to be placed in a position where we have to appropriate money or look for a war in order to keep a factory going.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Does the gentleman know that we have bought these plans and the right to make the Christie tanks in our arsenals at a cost of some $82,000?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have that right now?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then the point is even stronger.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. My understanding is they have not purchased the plans. Mr. Christie says they have not, although someone connected with the War Department says they have.

Mr. TABER. General Hof, the Chief of Ordnance, told me they had.

Mr. GOSS. That is where I got my information.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As I understand, under the law we could do that upon payment of a reasonable amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. In time of war?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In time of war; yes. In the meantime arrangements can be made to meet the situation; but the point now before the House is more important, as I have said, than the matter of the tanks. The Clague amendment will carry out the policy we have adopted since the war, while accepting the provision in the bill will change that policy and reestablish a policy which I believe has been a curse to peace in many countries, and that is to keep factories going for the purpose of manufacturing implements of war and in order to do this to look for a war in order to bring business to such factories.

I am going to support the Clague amendment.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to give the House a picture of this situation in five minutes. Briefly, this is the history of it:

Two years ago General Williams, then Chief of Ordnance, came before our subcommittee and asked us to provide a certain amount of money for the purchase of Christie tanks. General Williams said that he believed we should purchase four or five of these tanks in order to give them a proper service test. He said it was the most promising thing in the way of a tank he had ever seen. We provided the money in the bill to buy several of these tanks, and they bought one. Instead of buying four or five, as General Williams recommended, the War Department purchased one. Then the next year we put $200,000 in the bill again for the purchase of Christie tanks. Everybody connected with the Tank Corps said it was the most marvelous thing that had ever been developed. When they only bought one the first year, when we had provided money for five or six, Mr. Christie had to have funds; and he sold two chassis for this marvelous tank to Soviet Russia, because our War Department would not buy them when the money had been furnished by the Congress. The next year we put that $200,000 item in again, and then we were told that they were only going to buy one.

Now, right or wrong—and I think it is wrong—a certain amount of feeling has grown up in the War Department about this matter. The Chief of Ordnance, for whom I have the highest regard, in all of his testimony before our committee has shown himself as not favorable to the Christie tank.

We brought into our hearings last year from Fort Meade the men who operate these tanks, the men who commanded our Tank Corps and operated tanks in the World War, and the men who are working on mechanization; and every one of these men testified before our committee that this tank is so far superior to everything else in the tank line that there is absolutely no comparison.

General MacArthur, Chief of Staff, when he was before our committee this year, was asked at page 12 of the hearings:

Mr. BARBOUR. You just mentioned tanks, General. What have you to say about the Christie tanks?

General MACARTHUR. The Christie tank finally passed all the tests and we have ordered seven. My opinion is that that is the best tank that has ever been developed.

And later on he said:

It is the best tank yet developed, in my opinion.

What I fear now is this. If we change this language the Christie tanks will not be purchased but something else will be secured. He is the inventor of this tank. He has produced something that no other country in the world has been able in any way to approach. It is a marvelous thing, according to what the officers of our Tank Corps tell us, and for one I want to act upon the recommendations of the men who operate these tanks instead of the Ordnance Bureau here in Washington.

Now, one may be right and the other wrong; I do not know; but as between the two, I believe the weight of the testimony is with the men in the Tank Corps who have to operate them. This is why I want to see this money spent for the Christie tank, which the Chief of Staff and other experts say is the best thing in the tank line that has been developed anywhere in the world.

I do not care what language you use so long as we secure this tank, which, according to experts, is the best of its kind that has been developed anywhere.

If you leave it to the Ordnance Department, you may not get the Christie tanks. Mr. Christie owns a small factory up in New Jersey. It is no great industrial concern; he is an inventor and has a small plant there. He is entitled to some consideration for this remarkable invention that he wants this country to have. He had to sell two tanks to the Soviet Russian Government, simply because the War Department would not spend for these tanks the money that Congress appropriated.

Mr. ALLEN. Now, the gentleman has presented the Christie side of it.

Mr. BARBOUR. I have shown, too, that some in the War Department are not favorable to the Christie tanks, but the men who are best qualified—the men of the Tank Corps—want the Christie tanks.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COLLINS) there were 22 ayes and 33 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. DALLINGER: Page 43, line 9, strike out all after the figures "$9,805,724," down to and including the word "tanks," in line 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DALLINGER) there were 15 ayes and 23 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, strike out all after the word "than," in line 6, and down to and including the word "each," on line 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For operating, repair, and preservation of Rock Island bridges and viaduct and maintenance and repair of the arsenal street connecting the bridges, $47,000.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The amendment that I just offered proposed to strike out of the appropriation for four consulting engineers which the Secretary of War is given the right to employ at $50 a day. I should like to know from the chairman of the committee why it is necessary to engage outside engineers at the rate of $50 per day, when we spend millions and millions of dollars to educate engineers in our Military and Naval Academies and have them by the hundreds in the department? Does this mean that the engineers that we have educated are useless or incapable of performing their duties or of advising the department on these important works? I see that the chairman does not see fit to answer, and I presume he can not answer. I know it would be very hard for him to make an explanation.

Mr. COLLINS. I have a very good explanation. I do not think the money has been used in recent years. This is language that has been carried in the bill from year to year.

Mr. SABATH. Should it not be stricken out? I can not understand why we should appropriate that amount of money, especially in view of the fact that the country demands that we balance the Budget and that we do something to alleviate the pathetic conditions among the people. This afternoon I received a letter from the county commissioner of Cook County, Ill., who has charge of public welfare, stating that it is absolutely necessary that some relief be forthcoming in the near future or otherwise 100,000 families in the Chicago area will be deprived of the aid which has been given to them by Cook County.

The county has already appropriated $20,000,000, but unfortunately it was obliged to issue bonds, many of which can not be sold due to existing conditions. What is true of Cook County and of Chicago is true in every section of our country. Gentlemen, it appears to me that you do not care or you are totally oblivious to the needs of the people or you do not know what is transpiring in this country. I say in all seriousness that we should give heed and consideration to these conditions and we should not squander money under the pretense of national defense and fail to recognize the needs of millions of unemployed and starving people.

I ask unanimous consent to insert this letter, which is not a political letter, and at the same time to insert a letter that I wrote to the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency, asking their consideration of a proposition to aid the States and the municipalities, so that they could proceed to feed their hungry and starving people. I made every effort to secure a hearing from that committee but was unsuccessful. I got in touch with the members of the committee and secured their consent that a hearing might be given me. In desperation I wrote to all of the Members on the 22d of February. I received an answer from only five members of the committee. In the press yesterday it was reported that the President was coming out with a great plan to relieve the States and municipalities. Without any attempt at self-eulogy, it is obvious that he is again stealing my thunder, as he has done on several occasions before, particularly in regard to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Federal reserve amendment.

Here I have been advocating the proposition for three months or more and have not received any consideration whatever. O tempora! O mores! proh pudor!

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to print the two letters referred to by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters are as follows:

MAY 12, 1932.

Congressman A. J. SABATH,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: As chairman of the bureau of public welfare committee of the county board, I have a certain responsibility for the relief work of Cook County.

At present the financing is derived from a $20,000,000 bond issue authorized by the State legislature. Twelve million five hundred thousand dollars of this money was raised through tax-anticipation warrants sold to the citizens. This $12,500,000 is exhausted. There remains to be sold $6,000,000 additional tax-anticipation warrants. It is very problematical whether the citizens of Chicago will buy these warrants. If these warrants are bought, therefore, $18,500,000 total will be realized from the bond issue. The fund will be exhausted by July 15, at which time the relief work of Cook County, supporting more than 100,000 families, totaling approximately 500,000 people, will stop.

The discontinuing of relief in Cook County is unthinkable. As I see it, Federal relief will be urgently needed both for the purchasing of the tax-anticipation warrants at the present time and for the financing of the program after July 15.

Will you not give consideration to the Federal relief bills now pending in Congress and endeavor to secure aid for Illinois?

Very truly yours,

AMELIA SEARS,
County Commissioner.

FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: Having advocated early in 1930 the finance corporation plan and the enlargement of the power of the Federal Reserve Board, you will concede that I was not far afield in advancing remedies for the present economic crisis. I was, however, hopeful that either or both of these bills, now enacted into law, would make possible relief to some of our municipalities.

In the Reconstruction Finance Corporation we made it possible to extend relief to railroads, banks, and others. I assure you it will be much more beneficial to accord some relief to the municipalities, as any loans made to them will be repaid, so there will be no danger of the Government losing any money. By extending the relief I recommend it will be possible for many of these large cities to go on, otherwise there is a danger that they will be compelled to close their schools, discharge policemen and firemen, and restrict most of their activities. You can readily surmise what an effect it will have. By extending to them the privileges accorded to the railroads we will not only enable them to go on but make it possible for them to proceed with delayed and needed improvements, which will result in the reemployment of thousands of men now out of work and in distress.

We must not take for granted all that Secretary Mills and a few of the large bankers say. We must consider the existing conditions. Large financiers are fearful of inflation, which they believe will affect their securities and investments. If ever there was a need for inflation, this is the time. But why call it inflation? Do not the financial interests advance billions of dollars to foreign nations? Did not the call loans for speculative purposes in 1929 reach the fabulous total of $8,500,000,000, which to-day have been reduced to about $500,000,000?

Therefore, there is no danger of inflation if, in addition to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, we make possible, or under this act permit, loans to municipalities to the amount of $200,000,000. Remember the old adage, "A stitch in time saves nine."

Conditions in the large cities are alarming and, I repeat, something must be done or no one can foretell what may transpire. Please do not feel, therefore, that I am asking too much if I ask that a few mayors—for example, Mayor Walker, of New York; Mayor Cermak, of Chicago; Mayor Curley, of Boston; and Mayor Murphy, of Detroit—be given the opportunity to present their causes to your committee. They represent over 12,000,000 American people and cities that pay into the United States Treasury more than 70 per cent of our revenue. Therefore, I feel we can not in all justice ignore hearing them.

I have taken up this matter with the chairman, who has requested me to take up this question with you also and secure your consent for such hearings, which, I assure you, will not take up more than two and a half days. I did wish to see you personally, but due to illness in my family was obliged to leave. I will appreciate an early and favorable reply to my request.

Sincerely yours,

A. J. SABATH.

The Clerk read down to and including line 15, page 47.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. RAINEY having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COOPER of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11897 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CONNERY, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

CONSENT DAY

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to dispense with consent day on Monday next in order to go on with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that consent day be dispensed with on Monday next, and that it follow the disposition of this bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object, because we never have yet dispensed with it.

CHILDREN FIRST

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered over the radio by Hon. William E. McEwen, of the Department of Conservation Commission of the State of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the Hon. William E. McEwen, delivered over the radio on May 12, 1932, on the subject Children First.

Mr. McEwen is chairman of the Department of Conservation Commission of the State of Minnesota. He is publisher of the Labor World, of Duluth, Minn., and was labor commissioner of the State under Gov. John A. Johnson. The address is as follows:

I come to you to-day to plead for the right of every child in America—the child of the poor and the child of the rich—to that security and protection which can only be given to him with a decent family income.

We are passing through a tragic era. It is a time that tests the mettle in human souls. Hunger and want abound everywhere. Millions of willing workers are idle and they know not where to turn to seek food, clothing, and shelter for themselves and their children. Millions of farmers can not find purchasers of their products at decent prices. Their farms are heavily mortgaged and thousands of them are being foreclosed. Business men are burdened under heavy loads of debt and expense, from which they can not escape unless they quit entirely and find refuge in bankruptcy courts. Bankers are taking heavy losses. Many of them, unable to weather the storm, go down in ruin. Capitalists and investors are losing interest and dividends on their investments. Doctors, dentists, and lawyers may have plenty to do, but their patients and clients can not pay for the services they receive.

This is a trying time. Heavy are our cares, disturbing are our troubles, and burdensome our obligations. These personal worries lead and tempt us to center too much thought upon ourselves, and while struggling for our own security we unconsciously lose our social complex.

This is evident when we note the present hysterical demand for eliminating or curtailing certain important school activities and subjects, and reducing the salaries of teachers and other public employees, just to save ourselves a few dollars in taxes without regard to their effect on education, on family life, and on living standards.

The boys and girls of this depression are to be the men and women upon whom the Nation must rely in the next generation to direct her course from the backwash of these troubled times. Here we have the obligation of training and equipping the citizens of to-morrow to lead our country and its institutions over the treacherous shoals of political and economic disorder.

Shall we remain so blinded to our own temporary individual misfortunes that we fail to see and recognize the importance of preparing the children of this depression for the responsibility that will be theirs to take leadership and give direction to the destiny of the civilization, and all that goes with it, good and bad, that we shall pass on to them? This must not happen.

And yet this will happen unless a new social consciousness is aroused within us. The men and women who think only in terms of money, and tax saving and wage slashing, must not be permitted to have all their own way at the expense of the innocent boys and girls of this depression. If they do have their way now the Nation some day will be required to pay for it in one way or another, in illiteracy, poverty, disease, and crime.

The home is the first unit of society. It is the basic institution of our social order. It is the foundation on which the whole structure of society rests. From it radiates the spiritual and moral values that go to make up the human worth of our Nation. That which weakens the home saps at the vital force of society as a whole. The Nation's strength rests entirely on the security of the home.

The home is sustained by the income of the family's breadwinner. In a social order where justice prevails the income earned by the father will be sufficient to enable him to support his family in keeping with what we have come to call the American standard. What is that standard? It is this:

The home is comfortable, clean, sanitary, and wholesome. The food is nutritious, strength-building, health-giving, relishable, and quite diversified. The clothing is neat, appropriate for the varying weather, and sufficient to give decent style and comfort. The furnishings are such as to make the home more inviting to the children than anywhere else. In it will be found music, here and there works of art, a good library, wholesome magazines and other good reading matter, a radio set, and electric appliances to make home keeping and home making easier for the mother.

This is the kind of home every American father aspires to have and support. It can only be had by honest and willing workingmen when they receive good wages. They can not maintain such a home on low wages. When this home is kept up by good wages it means the family must buy more goods and more food than when wages are low. If all men and women who work for wages had been paid sufficient to support such an American home, in all probability we would not have the business depression from which we to-day suffer.

Now, what happens when wages are reduced and the income of the father is not sufficient to maintain accustomed standards in the home? When there are several children in the family, the oldest of them are forced to leave school and go to work to earn money to help make up for the loss the father has suffered through reduced wages. In a great many cases even the mother has been forced to leave home during the day and seek work in the homes of well-to-do people, to earn money in order that the family standard shall not be lowered.

Following the World War, when prices kept soaring and wages, which were supposed to have been high, were reduced, there was an unprecedented increase in the employment of children in the factories and shops of most every State in the Union. The fathers, with their lower incomes, were unable to maintain for their families their accustomed standard of living, and were compelled against their will, but by sheer necesssity, to take their children out of school and find jobs for them, or have them seek jobs for themselves.

Students of crime and family life generally agree that the alarming increase in crime among the youth of America during the past 12-year period is directly traceable to the lowering of home and living standards caused by the decline of family income. Since the depression there has been a still more marked increase in crime among the youth. This presents a serious situation that is a challenge to every man and woman concerned in the welfare and security of our Nation.

To save themselves a few immediate dollars in taxes there are well-meaning but short-sighted people who would add to the present critical youth peril by eliminating or curtailing school activities that have served in the past to give direction to the young lives of boys and girls at their play. They would do away with all recreational activities now carried on by the schools and drive boys and girls from well-directed playgrounds to the public streets and out-of-the-way places. They would have the old boy gang resurrected, with the gang leader and the evils that come in the wake of such untrained leadership, luring the boys to ways that are wayward. They would do this to save a few paltry tax dollars. They must not have their way.

It is time to invoke during this depression the unwritten law of the sea. In the face of danger and disaster on a sinking ship no man is permitted to save himself at the expense of the life of a child. Children come first on sinking ships. Children should come first in the consideration of every free government worthy of the name. The race can save itself—can lift itself higher—only as children are lifted up. In this critical period of depression, with its extreme want on one side and its extreme fortunes on the other, its innocent child victims have already suffered enough in their homes without being called on to have all their future blighted through the mad desire of selfish and visionless men and groups to be relieved of paying a few measly tax dollars into the school funds because of their temporary embarrassment.

This assault on the public schools and on the incomes of the masses of the people is a double blow to the children. To the men and women of to-day the problems of life are perplexing. What shall they be for the children when they grow up—for your children and mine? Fathers now out of employment are unable to provide for their families sufficient food to keep their young bodies strong and immune from the attacks of disease. It takes income to do this. The fathers are without incomes. When in America there is cultivated and developed the right sort of social consciousness, the relation between wages and child health, education and child welfare will be better understood.

And because we do not fully recognize this relationship many of us still cling to the old concept that the income of the wage earners should be based on the cost of food and other necessities of life. Recent reductions in prices have prompted many employers to reduce wages. They are now asking our local, school, county, State, and National governments to reduce the wages and salaries of their employees, which will give low-wage employers an additional excuse to still further reduce wages of their own employees.

All this is unsocial and uneconomic, and falls most heavily on the children. It means that they must give up many things their parents had planned for their cultural development. Young girls must go without their music. Many of them must find jobs clerking in stores for meager wages. Boys are required to give up many of their youth activities, which served so admirably in the development and building of character. What a price the wage cutters are exacting from the children!

With the improvement of machinery and the simplification of work processes low-wage employers have always sought to draw children from the home and school to their factories. They have wanted cheap labor without regard to its social costs. It was because of this practice that State legislatures have enacted laws making it unlawful to employ boys and girls under 16 years of age. These laws they have tried to weaken in their avid desire to exploit childhood for gain. In many of the Southern States the child labor laws are not applicable to children over 12 years of age.

Better than a child labor law is a decent income for fathers. No real parent will take his child from school, rob him of the opportunity to be trained and equipped for a useful and profitable life, and force him to early gainful labor, unless he is compelled by his own inability to earn sufficient money to support his family.

Back of every social and economic problem with which we are called on to deal is the question of low wages and low incomes, which first affects and weakens the home, then strikes at the school, and in rapid order hits business through a decline in buying power, starts an underconsumption of the products of farm and factory, curtails transportation, brings a decline in bank deposits, and finally is felt by the Government through the business depression and unemployment it causes. In simple language this is the sad story of to-day.

How the bankers who are leading the crusade against wages and salaries, and their supporters spread everywhere throughout the land, expect to pull our country out of the present depression surpasses understanding. Even if every industry began operating to-morrow morning with 100 per cent production there still would remain from two to three million unemployed workers in the land, with their children under the same handicaps as are all the other children whose fathers are now idle.

We are concerned about these children. America has an interest in them. How they are treated to-day, how they may be trained, their home environment, their attitude toward life and their country—all will have a tremendous influence on the national character 10 and 20 years hence.

Will these children, when they reach their majority, become loyal and patriotic citizens? Will they hold respect for our free government and its institutions? Will they revere the Constitution and uphold the majesty of the law? To what extent and in what degree will they contribute to the high citizenship expected of them? Will they have the capacity to act intelligently as voters? How will they be equipped to face the struggle of life and assist in solving the problems of government and the people?

Consider seriously these questions in the light of our present experiences, with crime highly organized, inviting new recruits to the underworld with its alluring promise of easy but hazardous gain, and with racketeering almost as general as legitimate business, the outlaws and racketeers holding human life as cheaply as fodder in a cornfield, and we may have a picture of our country 10 years hence. Good friends, can you not see that this wage, home, and child problem overshadows all other domestic and world problems? War debts may remain unpaid. The damage that made them necessary has been done. The soldiers may go without their bonus, except the sick and the maimed and the halt. The National Budget may go unbalanced, yet the Nation will still survive. But we can not return to the pathway of progress, happiness, and enduring prosperity unless and until the great millions of wealth-producing men and women are again steadily employed, earning American wages, supporting American homes, upholding American standards, and sending their children to school to become fitted for private and public duty. This is fundamental.

Raise the wage standards of the fathers and out the children will come from the factories and mills, from the shops and stores, and back they will go to the schoolrooms and the playgrounds, back to the sunshine and care-free happiness of childhood, of which countless millions have been robbed through man's greed and avarice. Mrs. Browning, in her immortal poem, gives us the picture of the children at work and sings a prayer for the day that will make childhood free. Let me conclude by reading from it a verse or two:

"Do ye hear the children weeping, O my brothers,
Ere the sorrow comes with years?
They are leaning their young heads against their mothers,
And that can not stop their tears.
The young lambs are bleating in the meadows,
The young birds are chirping in the nest,
The young fawns are playing with the shadows,
The young flowers are blowing toward the west—
But the young, young children, O my brothers,
They are weeping bitterly!
They are weeping in the playtime of the others,
In the country of the free.

"They look up with their pale and sunken faces,
And their look is dread to see;
For they mind you of their angels in high places,
With eyes turned on Deity.
'How long,' they say, 'how long, O cruel Nation,
Will you stand, to move the world on a child's heart,
Stifle down with a mailed heel its palpitation,
And tread onward to your throne amid the mart?
Our blood splashes upward, O gold heaper,
And your purple shows your path;'
But the child's sob in the silence curses deeper Than the strong man in his wrath!"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—ANALYSIS OF IMPORTANT MATTERS BEFORE CONGRESS

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, that the people of my district in northern Wisconsin may have direct information about the important matters acted upon by this Congress, I have prepared the following brief summary or analysis of each question in the order of its consideration in the House.

HOOVER MORATORIUM

The nations of Europe have given their solemn word to repay their war loans. Neither President Hoover nor any other international spokesman should be permitted to encourage these governments to repudiate their obligations. The debts are the assets of the people of this country. They are all we have to show for the $29,000,000,000 we sunk in 1917–18 making the world safe for democracy.

I am opposed to going to war to collect this money, but no self-respecting nation will force us to such an extremity. Let those nations meet their debts and pay them as fast as they are able. That is what our American farmers and other citizens are compelled to do. Many of our citizens have lost their farms, homes, and business because they were unable to get extensions of time on their debts. There should be no further moratoriums and no cancellations of foreign debts. It is for these foreign nations to decide if they want to assume the odium of repudiation.

Now we are frankly told by Germany that she will never pay another cent of war reparations, and England has left out of her budget for this year any item for payment of her American debt. Doubtless France, Belgium, and Italy will follow the same course.

These countries were ready last December to pay their interest of $252,000,000. They had the gold in New York to do it, when President Hoover by conference and by telegram tied Congress' hands and big heartedly told our foreign debtors to keep their money.

The generosity of President Hoover will undoubtedly cost the Nation just that amount—$252,000,000. Of course, the international-controlled newspapers and New York banking houses approved the President's action, because it meant that this $252,000,000 due the Treasury of the United States could then be used by these foreign nations to pay on their private loans to New York bankers.

Mr. Speaker, our Government was exceedingly generous with the foreign nations when Congress approved settlements of these debts in the amount of $11,522,354,000, giving them 62 years in which to pay the principal, at interest rates as low as 1 per cent in the case of Italy and in no instance over 3.7 per cent, which was made in the English settlement.

Based on the 4¼ per cent rate our own country is paying on the national debts incurred to secure the money advanced these foreign countries, it means that Congress compromised and settled these obligations at 26 per cent of the total amount due from Italy and graduated each settlement up to 65 per cent with England.

When these foreign-debt settlement bills were before the House January 16 to June 2, 1926, I voted "nay" on every one of them.

I said then and I still maintain these bills were unfair and unjust; that Congress had no right to increase the burdens of the American people that the nations of Europe might improve their economic structure and build up their military and naval forces.

I am still of that opinion and will continue to oppose any further moratoriums or cancellations of foreign debts.

THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation may have helped the big banks and railroads over a critical time, but it has done little or nothing for the country as a whole. The handful of seed loans peddled out to the farmers in an attempt to give the law an appearance of being a relief measure has proven to be a mere political gesture. "Hell and Maria" Dawes is here in Washington dishing out millions to the railroads and big banks with little or no publicity while the few thousand dollars being loaned to the farmers, with county and district committees to recommend, is being advertised to the heavens. All to the end that some poor farmer coerced by economic conditions is driven a little further into debt. I am opposed to relief based on more loans. I am opposed to people being coerced into debt through governmental agencies. This depression can not be solved by slashing wages of the workers or coaxing the farmers to borrow more money. Government relief to be worthy of the name must come in some form that will enable the workers to find a job and give the farmer an increase of prices for farm products that will enable him to live and pay some of the debts he now owes.

THE REVENUE BILL

Mr. Speaker, I well realize that it is of little effect for me to now point out to the Members of the House and the people of my district in northern Wisconsin that had the House leaders and majority of the Members voted as I did against the passage of the three Mellon tax bills in 1924, 1926, and 1928, reducing individual and corporation income taxes and surtaxes, we would not have our present two and one-half billion dollar deficit or our present difficulty in balancing the National Budget. These taxes during that era were not burdensome. If they had been allowed to stand, the public debt would have been reduced to around $10,000,000,000, instead of nearly $20,000,000,000 we owe to-day. If those taxes had been allowed to stand, the National Budget would balance itself.

Had the Mellon tax-reduction bills been killed, there would be no occasion to-day for discharging needed Government employees and cutting and slashing the wages of those who remain in the service. The soldiers' service certificates could easily have been paid in cash if the Mellon tax reductions had been defeated.

Every citizen knows that persons with common sense or corporations with sound judgment pay off all their debts as far as their incomes will permit. The Government, under the Mellon financial theories, did just the opposite. It lowered its tax rate and revenue therefrom at the same time it increased its expenses.

Relieving industry and wealth from their fair share of the burden of taxes under the Mellon bills was one of the prime causes of the era of inflation and exploitation of 1925 to 1929. Industry without taxes capitalized itself on a 6 per cent profit basis and sold its shares to the public to gamble on the market. The banks were drawn in. The people of every village and city in the Nation participated. It culminated in the market's explosion of 1929 and 1930 and the hard times and depression of to-day. It was greed and avariciousness gone mad. Now we are all paying the penalty for the economic crimes of a few national political and financial highbinders.

BEER TAX

Passage of the Beck-Linthicum resolution calling a constitutional convention to amend the eighteenth amendment would have met with popular approval in nearly every State of the Union. Led by the administration leaders in the House it was defeated by a vote of 227 to 187. The Republican leaders led in the defeat of the amendment to the tax bill providing for modification of the Volstead Act so as to permit the legal manufacture of 2.75 beer on which it was proposed to put a tax of 3 cents per pint, which would have produced over $500,000,000 in revenue annually.

Congress refused to legalize beer in order to levy a tax that would bring $500,000,000 a year, and yet there is a provision in the present revenue bill taxing wort, which is used in making home brew or illegal beer, at 5 cents per gallon; and the Treasury says this item will bring in $46,000,000 annually. What a spectacle of national hypocrisy! To tax illegal beer for revenue purposes. Prohibitionist Members supported this provision, but it looks like legal nullification to me.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

I supported the bill granting the Philippine Islands their independence because I believe the Government should redeem its promises made to the Philippine people by Admiral Dewey in 1898 when the Filipinos joined the American forces in Manila and with American guns and ammunition furnished by this Government helped drive the Spanish soldiers from the islands. It is against the fundamental principles upon which this Government was founded for one people to control another without their consent. To retain these islands against the wishes of the citizens of them who have proven themselves capable of self-government is a demoralizing influence on our own people.

Every day we retain the Philippine Islands just brings us that much nearer the time we are going to be called upon to defend them.

Philippine independence and the Goldsborough bill were the two major accomplishments of this Congress for agriculture. For years past the farmers through their national organizations have advocated Philippine independence.

To my mind, Philippine independence making it possible by tariff and other restrictions to bar or reduce importations of cheap vegetable oils used in the manufacture of oleomargarine is a long step forward in the protection of the American dairy farmer. It will help him solve his problem more than any single act of Congress. The Philippine representatives in Congress assure me they are glad and willing that this should be done. They say American financiers and American capital are solely responsible for the sale and manufacture of oleomargarine; that the Philippine people benefit little or none by this unfair and deceptive competition against American dairymen.

ECONOMY BILL

The big corporations of America have amassed huge cash surpluses and reserves, thereby insuring their officers' and directors' salaries of from $15,000 to $75,000 annually for years to come. Then by circular letter and propaganda spread from coast to coast they ask their stockholders to write their Congressmen to slash Government wages and salaries. The average wage paid all Government employees, including the Chief Executive and Members of Congress, is only $1,441 yearly.

These great industrial and political bosses would like to slash everybody's income but their own. They would like to reduce the income of Members of Congress to where ordinary citizens could not run for Congress.

This is a vital issue for the people of Wisconsin and the Nation. It goes right to the heart of our form of government. If independent and liberal-minded citizens are to be elected to represent the people in Congress they must be paid sufficient salary to enable them not only to live at home and in Washington but enough to cover all the other expenses that go with the office and enable them to save enough to pay their own campaign expenses every two years. Industrial and political bosses are ever willing to put up campaign and other expenses for candidates who will be amenable to them if elected.

People who believe in honest administration of the American idea of representative government can little afford to endanger the cornerstone of our whole system by forcing candidates for Congress to accept organization and financial support from the political bosses.

The combined salaries of the Members of the House and Senate including secretaries and clerks is less than $8,000,000 a year. This is less than one-fifth of 1 per cent of the National Budget. No farmer, workingman, or small business man in my district would pay one cent less in direct taxes were these salaries reduced by half. Nor would they pay one cent more were the salaries doubled. Few business men and no farmers or workingmen pay Federal income taxes, and the indirect taxes they pay in the form of tariff and excise fees will not be reduced.

It is well for Congress to economize in Government expenses. Every needless employee and governmental activity should be dispensed with, but this should be done in a sound businesslike way. In no case should it be done at the behest of selfish and greedy corporations who are themselves direct beneficiaries of the Government's favor.

Congressman SWING, of California, inserted in the RECORD last week identical letters as to the facts stated and the plea made for Government wage slashing by four great industrial corporations of America, all of them calling on their stockholders to write their Congressmen to reduce Government expenses by cutting Government wages. These four concerns alone circularized nearly the entire United States. They were the Standard Oil Co. of California, the E. I. du Pont Co. of Delaware, and the Commercial Investment Trust Co. of New York, and the Armour Co. of Chicago.

Scarcely a one of these concerns has reduced the price of the products it sells. Why should the Government by example help them reduce the wages paid their workers?

There are several corporations in this country that would gladly pay the entire eight million the Government pays in salaries to the Members of Congress and their secretaries would the law and the public permit it. Remember the philosophy of the great Samaritan:

No man can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one and love the other, or else he will hold to the one and despise the other.

Sixty to seventy per cent of the present Members of Congress are lawyers. Most of them find it necessary to augment their incomes by attending as much as possible to their private law practice. Many enlarge their incomes by lectures and speeches on the public platform.

If the voters of America want these representatives to remain their public servants they should pay them sufficient salary to enable them and their families to live and pay their own expenses.

No man can serve two masters.

WAR PREPAREDNESS AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

The hypocrisy of political leaders, both Republican and Democratic, as to actual economy was exposed when all voted against consolidation of the Army and Navy Department, estimated to save $100,000,000. They fought tooth and nail for every provision cutting wages and salaries, but not a cent did they want cut from the war activities of the Government.

Appropriations for support of the Army and Navy for this year are between seven and eight hundred million dollars, but economy leaders in Congress, backed by the President, are opposing any cuts for these two departments.

War preparedness and national defense seems more important to the Democratic and Republican leaders in the House than actual economy. Here was a chance to save a hundred million dollars without injuring the Government or the people, and the House leaders, aided by the President and the Republican side, turned it down cold.

Who are we afraid of that we must spend $700,000,000 in times of peace on national defense?

The whole world is economically and financially busted. Why not cut two or three hundred million of the 1933 appropriation for war preparedness and give the overburdened American taxpayer a chance to draw a free breath.

We still teach the words of the great Emancipator—

Love thy neighbor as thyself.

But the administration and political leaders here in Washington seem to think we should have a knife in one hand and a sawed-off shotgun in the other whenever we say "hello" to our foreign neighbors.

THE LAST OF THE ESCH-CUMMINS ACT

The House now has before it a bill to repeal the recapture clause of the Esch-Cummins railroad law. People of northern Wisconsin will well remember when this law went into effect in 1920. It raised all freight and passenger rates 35 per cent. This was in addition to the rate increases made during the World War. Most of northern Wisconsin products are of a low value, heavy weight class and these high rates have forced Wisconsin shippers to patronize trucks or quit shipping. Most of them have quit.

The recapture clause was the only provision in the Esch-Cummins Act designed in the public interest. It provides that one-half of the railroads' net earnings over 6 per cent should go to the Government to be used in financing the operation of the weaker roads. There is now due the Government under this clause $361,000,000, of which $13,000,000 has been paid. The present bill would cancel this Government obligation against the railroads if the bill passes, and it is expected it will. It is equivalent to the Government making the railroads an outright donation of $248,000,000. It is a vicious bill but the railroads and their financial owners in New York appear to have a sufficient number of friends in Congress to pass it.

Wisconsin Members as well as other Representatives of the Northwest States are opposed to it. The bill comes before the House accompanied by another provision giving the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to pass on all questions pertaining to railroad mergers. This second provision is a sop to sugar coat the first provision repealing the recapture clause.

It is like a bad Indian gift. They gave this to the public to sweeten the Esch-Cummins Act of 1920 and now in 1932 they take it away.

FARM LEGISLATION

The Federal Reserve Board under President Coolidge deflated agriculture in 1921 by calling in farm credits. From that day to this under Presidents Coolidge and Hoover the Government has through supervision and direction forced the national banks of the country to invest their depositors' money in industrial stocks and bonds as well as billions of dollars in dubious foreign securities.

To-day most of the national banks are loaded up with industrial stocks and bonds and European and South American bonds. Individual investors from Maine to California have in this manner been coerced by the Government at Washington to put their savings and investments into far-away industrial, commercial, and public-utility enterprises, many of them fictitious, and all of them watered to the hilt. All of these stocks and bonds were sold through New York banks and brokers who collected fat commissions on the sales. The Nation paid a ransom of $66,000,000,000 to the greedy, unscrupulous sharks of Wall Street.

Agriculture and the normal business of the Nation are at a standstill as a consequence. Then came 1929–30, and the bubble burst. Doctors, lawyers, and business men in the country, cities, and towns were fleeced of their wealth, and savings of a lifetime were swept away into the coffers of some New York broker.

It is not strange that the people did not see and suspect this colossal deception and financial fraud. It not only had the political backing of the National Government, but the open indorsement of national political leaders. The program was fostered and sold to the people through their own civic and commercial groups and organizations, like the National Chamber of Commerce.

Thus was agriculture deflated and the sound economic structure of every community destroyed.

When the Federal Reserve Board deflated the farmer in 1921 they destroyed the farm mortgage which for a hundred years had furnished the basis of security for every community in America. Doctors, lawyers, and business men no longer loan their savings or profits to their farmer patrons, but are compelled through Federal political control and supervision exercised over national banks to invest in that class of securities recommended by the big banks in New York and Chicago. The Federal Government required each local bank to carry as collateral and bank paper, bonds, preferred and common stock, sold by New York banks and trust companies.

Thus have the funds of every community been diverted to industry and the industrial East. Now, industry is dead, because the people's money is gone.

To-day a farm mortgage is no longer an asset but a liability. Thus has the whole country been deflated by greedy and unscrupulous financial and political leaders.

The people in 1921 had no way of knowing what was behind the deflation order of that year, but the leaders in this country knew. This deflation of the American farmer will go down in history as the economic crime of 1921.

A way must be found to rehabilitate and restore confidence of the people in their respective communities. First-mortgage loans on farms and city homes should again become the safest and best security in America. The local bank should again have in its vaults not pretty certificates of stocks and bonds in some far-away enterprise in another State or foreign nation but first mortgages and notes on the farms and homes in their communities. Bank loans on stocks and bonds should again be confined to local business enterprises. When this is brought about then will civic confidence and pride be restored to every American city and town. There can be no stable or lasting prosperity until the major portion of the wealth created in each community remains to bless the people who produce it.

VETERANS' ADJUSTED COMPENSATION

The plan for immediate payment of the balance due on the soldiers' adjusted-compensation certificates has been defeated for this session. The President, at the behest of organized wealth and industry, notified congressional leaders, both Republican and Democratic, that he would veto the bill if passed. Democratic leaders in the House seeking to gain the good will and favor of the great financial leaders of the country for the coming national campaign, sent the Patman bill to the Ways and Means Committee, where the leaders delayed consideration and prolonged the hearings until the soldiers' friends in Congress were prevented from getting the matter before the House for a vote. Petition to discharge the committee can not be used to bring the bill before the House, because the leaders in the House and Senate have agreed to adjournment on June 10, and the first day the committee could be discharged and the bill brought up under the rules of the House would be June 13.

This will be a bitter disappointment to millions of veterans and their dependents. They will find it hard to understand why Congress did nothing about cashing their certificates to relieve their distress in the hour of need. National leaders in both the Republican and Democratic Parties must carry the full responsibility for refusing to pay the World War veterans the value of their certificates at this time.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The President lectured Congress last week in a special message for its failure to cut governmental expenses. Before going into the merits of the lecture itself it is interesting to note a presidential edict of two weeks ago in which he stated no cuts in appropriations for the War and Navy Departments or military activities in general would be countenanced by him. Nor did he mention any reduction in the annual payment of $50,000,000 to private shipowners and operators in the form of ship subsidies.

The President in his appeal insisted that Congress reduce governmental expenditures $700,000,000. It is interesting to consider in this connection the congressional program of economy as compared with the President's plea. The House and Senate have already cut the presidential recommendations made through the Bureau of the Budget $50,000,000 in those departmental bills already acted upon by both bodies. The House has reduced appropriations by $99,000,000 below the presidential recommendations on measures now pending in the Senate, and the Senate is planning another reduction of 10 per cent flat on all other appropriations below the amount recommended by the President. This would afford a saving of $285,000,000.

The economy bill which passed the House last week includes an 11 per cent reduction in the salaries of the Members of Congress, which amounts to $1,100 annually for each Member, plus a 25 per cent reduction in mileage allowances, and an 11 per cent reduction of salaries of the employees of Congress drawing more than $2,500 per year, making a saving of $30,000,000 more. Thus we have a total saving of $464,000,000 for the House and Senate, and other savings are in the process of being made. The President claims to have already pared the Budget Bureau recommendations to Congress on appropriations $369,000,000. If he is correct in this claim, then the House and Senate have reduced governmental expenses for the year 1933 by $833,000,000, which is $133,000,000 more than the President asked that they be reduced in his message.

In the light of these figures the President's claim of national saving and general economy in Government should not impress the people of America, as history shows us in this as in nearly every other crisis Congress has been faithful to the public interest.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY STILL A PROMISE

People of northern Wisconsin in 1928 voted for Herbert Hoover for President because they were assured by the press and the campaign speakers that his election would insure the immediate building of the St. Lawrence waterway. That was four years ago and not a single thing has been done since then toward consummation of this vital project.

The people of Wisconsin will, I hope, understand that the matter is entirely in the hands of the President and his State Department to negotiate a treaty with Canada.

Reams and reams of publicity have been emanating from Washington to the effect that a treaty was just around the corner. It must still be there for not one word on the subject has passed from the President to Congress since his election four years ago.

Like the platform pledge to put agriculture on a parity with industry, it is still to be redeemed.

American voters living on the farms and in the Great Lakes States will be asked to declare a moratorium on campaign promises in November, 1932.

With all the words we have in the English language it is strange that those who control our national conventions can not find some that mean what they say.

CHEAP GOVERNMENT EXPLOSIVES

My bill, H. R. 10889, providing for the transfer of powder and other explosive materials from the War Department to the Department of Agriculture for use in land clearing has been supplemented by the introduction of H. R. 12047. The new bill was introduced in order that the changes recommended by the committee might be incorporated in the bill which was favorably reported by the Johnson subcommittee to the whole Committee on Military Affairs.

Members of the whole committee have assured me that the report of the subcommittee will be accepted and the bill will be favorably reported to the House before the close of the present session.

At a hearing held on the bill April 30, nine Members of the House appeared with me in support of the bill. We were ably assisted by officers of the National Grange, Farmers' Union, National Dairy Union, and the American Farm Bureau Federation.

The bill provides for the same distribution of these Government explosives as was made from 1920 to 1926. The Government recartridges and prepares the powder ready for stump blasting and distributes it through the State agricultural colleges, who in turn send it out through the county agents.

Friends of the bill hope to get it through Congress early enough next session to make the explosives available to the farmers for land clearing next spring.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—DISTRICT OFFICE SERVICE OF THE BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, the United States produces more than it consumes, and foreign markets are essential to absorbing our surplus products.

Whenever, through artificial barriers or otherwise, we experience a loss or contraction of markets at home or abroad the effect is felt severely by both agriculture and industry.

The recent tremendous decline in our foreign trade has contributed materially to existing conditions, and it is vital to the welfare of our people that every effort be made to revive our trade and regain lost markets.

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has done excellent work in the face of tremendous difficulties, in stemming the decline of our trade, and in helping to find markets for a great deal of our products which would otherwise have been without purchasers.

It has made its service valuable to both agriculture and industry, and, through district offices, has established contacts and rendered services of a most conspicuous character.

Just how valuable such service through district offices has been during the last fiscal year is reflected in a statement recently set forth in a letter to me from the director of the bureau, reading as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE,
Washington, January 9, 1932.

Hon. CLAY STONE BRIGGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Knowing your interest in the Galveston district office of this bureau, it is gratifying to be able to call to your attention, for your criticism or suggestion, the definite services that this offices has been able to extend.

During the past fiscal year, 13 firms out of approximately 35 currently contacted reported a total of new business and savings of $965,706 made possible to them entirely through our assistance and cooperation. This figure, representing an average of $74,285.07 per firm reporting, becomes significant when compared with the annual cost of maintenance ($8,000) of our Galveston branch.

This ample return on money expended was nation-wide. At the present time we are currently serving about 25,000 firms. Of these, 2,087 reported new business possible by our activities, at $57,554,812.51—a rather large total in a year that was particularly trying to industry.

This return on $5,086,660 invested, the appropriation for this bureau, approximately a return of $11 to $1 of expenditure, takes no account of the many intangible services we render, nor of our domestic commerce activities directed toward the reduction of distribution costs. Services of this nature have increased 70 per cent during the past fiscal year, and the combined receipt of requests for information, both foreign and domestic, have reached 12,600 a day.

Recently our manager in Galveston reported the inauguration of an intensive campaign to bring to the attention of the business concerns in his area the benefits of practical application of domestic research previously completed. The preparedness of our Texas office to aid in foreign-trade problems is already well known, and in confirmation we have on file flattering letters from some of the largest organizations in the State.

I am calling these details to your attention in my desire to bring to interested Members of your body a more familiar and intimate glance into our functions. The figures presented above, the only profit-and-loss statement possible of preparation, are forwarded with the belief that in these times of guarded expenditures and expansions in all lines of economic activity, the financial returns or records of a Government bureau may be, perhaps, as interesting and illuminating as those of any individual concern.

Very truly yours,

FREDERICK M. FEIKER, Director.

It is evident that the district-office service of the Commerce Department should not be impaired, and that adequate provision should be made for its continuation when it is making such a wonderful return to the people.

JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 382. Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for printing and binding for Congress for the fiscal year 1932.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, May 16, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. HULL. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] on account of illness.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are detained in a meeting of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] are detained in a meeting of the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

DEPRECIATION OF FOREIGN-CURRENCY VALUES

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the acting chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, transmitting, as a second supplement to the material sent to the Senate on May 2 and May 9, 1932, in partial response to Senate Resolution 156, a text to accompany the tables showing the effects of depreciated currencies on the import trade of the United States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas certain measures have been introduced before the Senate of the United States in accordance with recommendations contained in a report submitted to said Senate by the Attorney General of the United States, which said report was made pursuant to a resolution of said Senate (S. Res. 134); and

Whereas said measures substantially affect the rights and privileges now enjoyed by the people of the Territory of Hawaii, which rights and privileges should not be curtailed or affected without opportunity being afforded the people of the Territory of Hawaii to be heard; and

Whereas a joint committee of the House of Representatives and of the Senate of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii has been appointed to study the report of said Attorney General and to make a report thereon with recommendations to said legislature; and

Whereas all facts, statistics, and other data to be prepared and compiled by said joint committee, as well as all its findings and recommendations, should be made available to the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii so as to enable him to adequately present the position of the Territory of Hawaii in relation to all matters affecting the Territory of Hawaii, now pending in Congress, or which may arise therein, prior to the commencement of the next regular session of the territorial legislature; and

Whereas it appears improbable that said joint committee will be able to complete the work committed to it prior to July 1, 1932: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That Congress be requested to delay all hearings upon all matters hereinbefore referred to until some date subsequent to July 1, 1932, so that the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii may be in possession of sufficient facts, statistics, and other data to more intelligently present the position of the Territory of Hawaii at any hearings which may be held before any committees or subcommittees of the Senate or of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States upon all matters hereinbefore referred to; and be it further

Resolved, That a certified copy of this concurrent resolution be forwarded to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 30, 1932.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was finally adopted by the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii on April 30, A. D. 1932.

ROY A. VITOUSEK,
Speaker House of Representatives.
HENRY VAN GILSON,
Assistant Clerk House of Representatives.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 30, 1932.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted in the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii on April 30, A. D. 1932.

ROBERT W. SHINGLE,
President of the Senate.
ELLEN D. SMYTHE,
Clerk of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, memorializing Congress to provide for the construction of a ship canal across the State of New Jersey from Raritan Bay to the Delaware River, at a point near the head of navigation, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. (See joint resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. BARBOUR on the 14th instant, pp. 10540–10541, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a memorial from the Philippine Barristers' Association of California, Los Angeles, Calif., remonstrating against deferring the granting of independence to the Philippine Islands, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KEAN presented a memorial of members and friends of the South Jersey Radio Association, in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the imposition of a tax on amateur radio stations and operators, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TYDINGS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Baltimore, Md., favoring adoption of the so-called Bingham plan to legalize and tax 4 per cent beer so as to avoid increased taxes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VANDENBERG presented a petition of sundry citizens of Holland, Mich., praying for retrenchment in Federal expenditures and the balancing of the Budget through the consolidation or elimination of unnecessary bureaus and services, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DISABILITY ALLOWANCE TO WORLD WAR VETERANS

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, some days ago I mentioned the unwarranted propaganda which is making the rounds against all veterans' legislation. This propaganda has not even spared the disabled soldier nor the dependents of those who are gone. At this point, and not to take any more of the time of the Senate, I desire to have incorporated in the RECORD a letter from John Thomas Taylor, vice chairman of the national legislative committee of the American Legion. Mr. Taylor's letter has to do with this very subject, and I think not only the Senate but the country ought to know something of the viciousness of the propaganda to which I have referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., May 14, 1932.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Senators should realize that thousands of the form letters received daily on Capitol Hill are coming from factory and industrial workers, whose employers have coerced them to demand Government economy, including reduction in benefits for the disabled. Doubtless many of these letters are from veterans, but Senators understand that many of these signers think a refusal to write would result in the loss of their jobs.

This sudden demand to cut benefits for the disabled is not spontaneous but is inspired. It is the result of propaganda, carefully organized by the same group which has always opposed beneficial legislation for veterans, whether disabled or not. The propaganda is also designed to influence the Senate against the widows and orphans bill, which has already passed the House.

In 1924, when bonus bills were pending in the Congress, those who profited from the war said to the soldiers who had fought the war to victory:

"Everything for the disabled—nothing for the able-bodied. We can never do enough for the disabled."

Now this same group which posed then as the friend of the disabled—to defeat bonus legislation—again employs its propaganda methods, this time against the disabled. Eight years ago their slogan was, "There can be no tax reduction with a bonus"—but we had both just the same. Taxes were cut more than a billion. Now it is, "We can not balance the Budget unless we cut disabled benefits." Senators should reflect upon that former error.

The American Legion at its Detroit convention did not join the demand for cashing the bonus. You probably recognize that this hostile group waited until that danger was passed before attacking the disabled in full force. Many believe this group more responsible than any other for the present deflation in security values, with the accompanying loss of Government revenues. They are using this situation, which they have created, to attack the disabled and balance the Budget at the expense of the unfortunate.

Let us consider this matter sanely and not be stampeded. If the cut in disabled benefits is just, such action will bear the light of day—it can be openly demonstrated by public hearings, where both sides will have their day in court. Let those who are flooding you with propaganda come before you openly. If they can prove their case, no harm will result from an open and honest examination of the evidence.

Remember you are dealing with men who are disabled, men definitely weighed down in life's handicap.

The Legion, therefore, as earnestly as it can, opposes what it is now proposed to do in haste—to deprive disabled soldiers, behind closed doors, of benefits which the Congress has granted during 13 years of open hearings, at which the Legion testified.

We ask of the Senate instead two things we have earned the right to ask:

1. The enactment of the bill for widows and orphans so that they may be cared for in this period of distress. The cost of this is small, but it will mean at least an existence to thousands.

2. A Senate veterans' committee, that the problems of hospitalization, of the disabled, and the widows and orphans of the dead may be studied carefully in the open, with testimony on both sides of each question. The disabled are worthy of such consideration.

The Legion welcomes a searching examination of veterans' benefits in the orderly, open manner of the Senate. But to take away, behind closed doors, disabled benefits openly obtained is unjust and un-American, and a grateful nation would not forgive such procedure. This course we emphatically protest and oppose—and the full force of the American Legion will be thrown against it.

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR,
Vice Chairman National Legislative Committee.

UNITED STATES EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

Mr. DAVIS presented a letter from Lewis G. Hines, Pennsylvania director, United States Employment Service, with an accompanying letter addressed by him to Mr. John B. Andrews, secretary, American Association for Labor Legislation, New York City, N. Y., which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., April 30, 1932.

DEAR SENATOR: I have before me a copy of a letter that was addressed to Members of the House of Representatives and the United States Senate and signed by John B. Andrews, secretary, American Association for Labor Legislation, which is an attack upon the United States Employment Service.

I am inclosing herewith a copy of a letter addressed to Mr. Andrews. I feel that the criticism directed at us by Mr. Andrews is not only unwarranted but unfair and unjust. I further feel that the people of Pennsylvania are well satisfied with the character of the service we are rendering.

This knowledge comes from personal contact with the various groups and individuals throughout the State who have commended us for the splendid work we are doing. I would appreciate your careful perusal of my letter to Mr. Andrews and a further investigation on your part of the merits of the statement contained in his letter to you.

I feel that such an investigation will warrant your assuming that the splendid work of the United States Employment Service should be perpetuated.

Very truly yours,

LEWIS G. HINES,
Pennsylvania Director United States Employment Service.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., April 30, 1932.

MR. JOHN B. ANDREWS,
Secretary American Association for Labor Legislation,
131 East Twenty-third Street, New York City, N. Y.

DEAR MR. ANDREWS: I have before me a copy of a letter under date of April 19 addressed to the Members of the House of Representatives and the United States Senate signed by you.

This letter, an attack upon the United States Employment Service as it is now conducted, unfortunately does not set forth the nature of "the stream of complaints" which you state has reached your national headquarters from the various States, "indicating that the plan which Secretary Doak has attempted to put into effect in the last year is a serious mistake and can never be satisfactory in the various States."

I can not presume to speak for any of the States except Pennsylvania, but I can and will take exception to your criticism of our work in so far as it pertains to Pennsylvania. It would be interesting to know if any of these complaints you state have reached your headquarters emanated from Pennsylvania; and if so, if it would be possible for me to have more information regarding them in order that I might intelligently reply to them.

I invite your attention to the fact that since the inauguration of this extended service of about a year ago that we in Pennsylvania have done some very efficient and constructive employment-service work. We have cooperated with and coordinated the various employment efforts through the State, beginning with the department of labor and industry, where a splendid cooperative arrangement exists whereby jointly we conduct 13 offices throughout the entire State, assisting financially in a substantial manner in the maintenance of the same.

In addition to this we are cooperating with chambers of commerce, fraternal organizations, employer and labor groups, and soldier organizations. Apparently everyone in Pennsylvania is satisfied with the splendid arrangement that exists in this State. The finest relationship exists between ourselves and the director of employment of the department of labor and industry and the director of the Pennsylvania Employment Commission, both of whom have personally commended us and cited their satisfaction with the existing arrangements.

Such organizations as the chambers of commerce, the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor, the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American War Veterans, the Jewish Welfare Association, the Knights of Columbus, the Odd Fellows, and various independent employment groups have indorsed our efforts.

I quote from a telegram received under date of February 23 from the Hon. Gifford Pinchot, Governor of Pennsylvania, wherein he says:

"I commend you personally for your cooperation and the cooperation of your staff with the agencies of the Commonwealth."

The Hon. J. Hampton Moore, mayor of Philadelphia, recently expressed himself in these words:

"The high character of the service that your organization is rendering the people of Philadelphia is well known."

More recently, in recognition of the service rendered soldier groups of Pennsylvania, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the American Legion, and the Disabled American Veterans jointly presented this office with a token of their appreciation in the form of an American flag, for what they termed the splendid service given them. This presentation was attended by representatives of all fraternal and civic and employer and labor groups, and only modesty prohibits me from quoting the many nice things said about us at that time.

Perhaps it might be well to be more specific in regard to our actual accomplishments. Our records for the past three months indicate that 576 men and women secured employment through the exclusive efforts of the United States Employment Service, and during that time positions were found through the joint efforts of the United States Employment Service and the Department of Labor and Industry for 8,979 men and women. In addition to this, on February 1, we had the names of 7,000 disabled veterans on our lists throughout the State of Pennsylvania, and our field force of seven men has succeeded in reducing this list by a considerable number. We feel that we have accomplished very much on behalf of this type of applicant considering the many factors that enter into employment matters for them.

I am at loss to know from just what sources the "stream of complaints" mentioned in your letter should emanate. I realize that anyone doing constructive work is subject to criticism. I further realize that there are certain elements throughout the country that are definitely opposed to any movement in which they are not active participants. I recall at the time of the inauguration of this service, certain published statements of a critical nature emanating from sources which, in my opinion, were motivated by selfish, personal interests. Obviously these criticisms were not only unfair but premature, in as much as the service had not yet started.

I am satisfied with the character of the service being rendered in Pennsylvania and would welcome an opportunity to reply to the stream of complaints reaching your headquarters in so far as it pertains to Pennsylvania, and again I ask if you can give me such a list of complaints. Apparently, the criticism of our service contained in your letter of April 19 does not pertain to Pennsylvania, and I feel the various agencies and organizations I have mentioned herein will join me in this thought.

Trusting that we may be favored with a more explicit statement of the reasons for your criticism of our work, I am

Very truly yours,

LEWIS G. HINES,
Pennsylvania Director, United States Employment Service.

"EMERGENCY INDUSTRIES PRESERVATION ACT"

Mr. FLETCHER presented a resolution for an "emergency industries preservation act," adopted by a convention of 420 company members of supply and machinery associations at Cincinnati, Ohio, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION FOR AN "EMERGENCY INDUSTRIES PRESERVATION ACT"

The 420 company members of the American Supply and Machinery Manufacturers' Association, the National Supply and Machinery Distributors' Association, the Southern Supply and Machinery Distributors' Association, in triple joint convention assembled, unanimously urge upon the President and the Congress of the United States immediate and favorable consideration of the following emergency resolution passed by their association at Cincinnati to-day:

"We believe that one of the principal causes of the present distressed condition of industry is the demoralization from reckless competition occasioned by the inability of competing sellers to cooperate lawfully and effectively, not alone in the development and use of our natural resources but equally so in the general business of manufacture and distribution.

"Destructive competition, whether due to overcapacity or to inequality of privilege under the law between buyers and sellers, destroys earning capacity and creates industrial maladjustment. Preservation of pay rolls and investments is the imperative condition—precedent to the preservation of mass purchasing power, to the permanent supply of consumer needs and to keeping open the essential source of all public taxing power. Since earning must precede spending, it is therefore the primary necessity of a nation's economic welfare.

"Court interpretation of our antitrust laws protects buyers by restricting the privileges of sellers. Sellers are thus denied equal privilege with buyers in determining economic levels of price and production. Correction of this prevailing legal emphasis upon consumer welfare must precede restoration of industrial equilibrium. Since the producing functions of capital and labor represent one-half of the entire public interest, we hold that economically the consumer is not entitled to a price that has not first afforded a fair profit to every necessary and efficient agency of both manufacture and distribution.

"We therefore urge:

"(1) That a committee be immediately appointed by Congress carefully to investigate the workings of all phases of our antitrust laws; and (without sacrificing the present needed and intended prohibitions of our antitrust laws against monopoly, oppression of competitors tending thereto, and unfair trade practices) to propose such legislation as will permit cooperative agreements between sellers to such extent as may be necessary.

"(a) To avoid destructive competition.

"(b) To avoid wastage of materials.

"(c) To help stabilize pay rolls.

"(d) To avoid the constant incentive to capital concentration otherwise inevitable.

"(e) To preserve earnings—the fountain source of all tax revenues.

"(f) To restore industrial equilibrium by restoring equality of privilege between buyer and seller.

"(g) To promote the public interest by giving balanced weight to the needs of capital and labor at least equally with that of the consumer.

"(2) That, pending this determination of the proper form of permanent legislation, Congress pass before adjournment of the present session an 'emergency industries preservation act' conveying this necessary relief temporarily under the supervision of the Federal Trade Commission and in conformity with its judgment of the public interest. We particularly point out that during the interim gross abuse of the consumer interest is practically impossible.

"In the belief that this resolution accurately reflects the views of the preponderant mass of this country's producers, distributors, and workers, we further instruct our secretaries to send a copy hereof to each Member of Congress, to the President and members of his Cabinet, to the Justices of the Supreme Court, to other trade associations, and to the trade and business press."

Respectfully and urgently submitted.

H. H. KUHN, President.
GEORGE A. FERNLEY, Secretary.

BALANCING THE BUDGET AND TAXATION

Mr. FLETCHER presented a letter from the secretary of the Miami Beach (Fla.) Chamber of Commerce with an accompanying resolution, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MIAMI BEACH, FLA., May 12, 1932.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
The United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: Inclosed find copy of a resolution passed this day by our board of governors and sent to the Finance Committee in Washington and which we believe will be of interest to you.

Very respectfully yours,

MIAMI BEACH CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
CHAS. W. CHASE, Sr., Secretary.

Whereas we learn through the Associated Press that a saving of $200,000,000 is needed to keep the Government outlay within its Budget; and

Whereas it is certain that if appropriations now made are not reduced, many manufacturing products will be taxed to produce an amount large enough to balance the Budget, thereby creating another burden on the Nation's taxpayers; and

Whereas it is our belief that an amount equal to the $200,000,000, which is required to balance the Budget, could be raised if taxes were levied on income realized from nontaxable securities and by the taxation of salaries of employees of political subdivisions, whose salaries are now exempt; Now therefore be it

Resolved by the board of governors of the Miami Beach Chamber of Commerce, anxious to stand firmly by our President in his desire to balance the Budget, that we send the following suggestions to the Finance Committee in Washington, in the hope that it may be instrumental in assisting them to take steps that would be appreciated by the majority of the taxpayers of our country:

1. That all securities, the income of which is now regarded and recognized as nontaxable, be classified as taxable income.

2. That all city, municipal, and/or State employees, whose salaries or wages are under the present revenue act, exempt from tax be also subjected to tax in the same manner as salaries received by employees in the employ of organizations other than political subdivisions: Be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be also sent to the President of the United States, to our Senators, Congressmen, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and to other interested organizations throughout the country.

This resolution was adopted by the board of governors of the Miami Beach Chamber of Commerce in meeting assembled in Miami Beach, Fla., this 12th day of May, 1932.

CUSTOMS PORT OF ENTRY, ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a resolution adopted by the City Commission of St. Augustine, Fla., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution No. 842 (introduced by Commissioner V. J. Mickler), requesting the United States Senators from Florida and Members of the House of Representatives from Florida in the Congress of the United States to protest against the abolishing of the customs port of entry at St. Augustine, Fla.

Whereas it has been stated to the city commission of the city of St. Augustine, Fla., that the Government of the United States contemplates abolishing the United States customs port of entry at St. Augustine, Fla; and

Whereas the City Commission of the city of St. Augustine, Fla., is advised that said abolishment of said customs port of entry is contemplated in the near future; and

Whereas the City Commission of said city of St. Augustine, Fla., believes that this city is entitled to a customs port of entry, and that said customs port of entry is of a great value to the shrimp industry, which is one of the leading businesses in the city of St. Augustine, Fla.; and

Whereas the Federal Government has not only removed the United States garrison from St. Augustine and the United States wireless station but has taken away every Government operation that has ever been here, with the exception of the customs port of entry and the lighthouse; and

Whereas the city commission of the city of St. Augustine feels that the United States customs port of entry is a necessity and should not be removed or abolished from the city of St. Augustine, Fla.: Therefore be it

Resolved by the City Commission of the City of St. Augustine, as follows:

1. That the Senators and Representatives in the United States Congress from the State of Florida be, and each of them are hereby, most respectfully requested to protest against the abolishing of the United States customs port of entry at St. Augustine, Fla.

2. That the city auditor and clerk of the city of St. Augustine, Fla., immediately transmit a copy of this resolution to each of the aforesaid Members in the United States Congress.

Passed in open session of the City Commission of the city of St. Augustine, Fla., this 11th day of May, A. D. 1932.

T. ROGERO MICKLER,
Mayor-Commissioner.

Attest:

CHAS. E. KETTLE,
City Auditor and Clerk.

PROTECTION OF ANASTASIA ISLAND, FLA., FROM EROSION

Mr. FLETCHER presented resolutions adopted by the City Commission of St. Augustine, Fla., which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution 843 (introduced by Commissioner Rowand), requesting the United States Senators in the United States Senate and the Congressmen in the House of Representatives from the State of Florida to introduce and seek to pass legislation appropriating moneys by the United States Government to protect Anastasia Island from erosion and to repair the jetties built some years ago by the Federal Government near the city of St. Augustine, Fla., but now in the city of St. Augustine, Fla.

Whereas the city of St. Augustine, Fla., has heretofore, through its city commission, respectfully requested the United State Senators in the United States Senate and the Representatives in the House of Representatives in the United States Congress from Florida to introduce and secure appropriate legislation in order that money may be appropriated by the Government to be used in rebuilding and repairing jetties formerly built by the United States Government near St. Augustine, Fla., but which are now within the city limits of the city of St. Augustine, Fla., on the arm of the sea of the Atlantic Ocean on the east coast of St. Augustine, Fla., on Anastasia Island; and

Whereas the city commission has called to the attention of the United States Senators from Florida in the United States Senate and the Representatives in the House of Representatives in the United States Congress from Florida to the erosion caused by the sea, damaging and injuring Government and private property on Anastasia Island in St. Augustine, St. Johns County, Fla.; and

Whereas the city commission had been informed that there are no funds available for the repair of said jetties and that the engineer's office has reported that there is not sufficient marine traffic to justify an expenditure for deepening the harbor and repairing the jetties; and

Whereas the appropriations by the United States Government in the past to St. Augustine and St. Johns County, Fla., have simply amounted in money to nothing compared with the appropriations made to other cities, districts, and towns on the east coast of Florida; and

Whereas the citizens of the city of St. Augustine, Fla., feel that they are entitled to representation and that they are entitled to protection against the ravage of the sea; and

Whereas the city of St. Augustine, Fla., has from time to time expended sums of money in attempting to check the erosions of Anastasia Island; and

Whereas a long sea wall or sea walls have been constructed on the northeast point of the arm of the sea, east of the northeast point of Anastasia Island, and there is constructed a sea wall on the east side of the Matanzas River, on the west bank of Anastasia Island, in the city limits of the city of St. Augustine, Fla., occasioning an investment in cost of many thousands of dollars by many property owners; and

Whereas there has been an expenditure by private citizens on Anastasia Island to prevent erosion by the Atlantic Ocean on the shore line in the amount of nearly $60,000; and

Whereas the expenditure by private owners in building the sea wall above mentioned along the Matanzas River occasioned the expenditure of a sum far in excess of said above expenditure and amounting to many thousands of dollars; and

Whereas the city of St. Augustine, Fla., has for the past 10 or 15 years endeavored to get such legislation and some relief from the United States Congress in respect to these objects: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the city commission of the city of St. Augustine, Fla., That the United States Senators in the United States Senate from the State of Florida, and the Representatives from Florida in the House of Representatives in the United States Congress be, and each of them is hereby requested by the city of St. Augustine, Fla., to take the following steps:

First. To obtain a survey and investigation of the repairs necessary and adequate to the jetties on Anastasia Island on the coast of the municipality of St. Augustine, Fla., and the condition of the erosion on Anastasia Island by the Atlantic Ocean, in the city of St. Augustine, Fla.

Second. That the Senators and Representatives in the United States Congress from the State of Florida, confer and consult together, and prepare and introduce such legislation as is necessary to produce an appropriation sufficient in amount to insure the repair of the United States Government jetties within the municipality of St. Augustine, Fla., and to protect the shore line of Anastasia Island within the city limits of said city of St. Augustine, Fla., from erosion by the Atlantic Ocean: Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent, under the hand and seal of the city auditor and clerk, to the two United States Senators in the United States Senate from the State of Florida, and the several United States Representatives from the State of Florida, in the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and that a letter be also sent under the hand and seal of the said city auditor and clerk to the said several United States Senators and the Congressmen from Florida, requesting that they acknowledge receipt of said resolution and that they give the city commission the benefit of their views upon said legislation at an early date.

Passed in open session of the city commission of the city of St. Augustine, Fla., this 11th day of May, A. D., 1932.

T. ROGERO MICKLER,
Mayor-Commissioner.

CHARLES E. KETTLE,
City Auditor and Clerk.

EMERGENCY FINANCIAL RELIEF

Mr. FLETCHER presented a proposed plan for emergency financial relief by E. B. Clutter, of Miami, Fla., which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROPOSED PLAN FOR EMERGENCY FINANCIAL RELIEF FOR ALL SECTIONS OF THE UNITED STATES

By E. B. Clutter, Miami, Fla.

United States Congress would create a revolving fund subject to loan on a basis of $500,000 to each community with a population of 250,000 people; estimated amount of revolving fund needed, $2,400,000,000, to be loaned under the following plan:

1. All loans to be made through Federal reserve member banks, who would put up collateral for the amount which they were handling, this business to be segregated entirely from the regular banking business, and same to be handled through a special department and office in the bank to be provided for same, office to be known as the Federal relief department, and which department would be presided over by an agent appointed by the Federal reserve bank department, who would loan said funds through the advice and cooperation of the president of the bank.

2. These funds to be loaned in the amounts of $500 to $5,000 to people who could give proper security, which would include real estate, mortgages, stocks, bonds, etc.

3. Rate of interest to be charged to be 5 per cent, payable quarterly. No loans to be made for a longer period than two years. These funds to be loaned only to people who would sign an agreement and obligate legally to expend same for the following purposes:

Employment of labor, not less than 50 per cent of total loan.

Payment of taxes.

Payment of interest on mortgage loans.

The borrower to be required to file report at the end of 90 days showing that the money had been disbursed as agreed, any portion of same which had not been disbursed to be called in at the discretion of Federal agent.

4. Repayment of loan to start at the end of five months' period, 5 per cent monthly, and total loan to be paid within two years.

5. The cost of operation of this proposed plan to be taken out of the interest items collected on the loans.

6. This plan does not contemplate the financing of general business but is designed to put money into circulation through employment of labor, who would in turn automatically spend same through the channels of business and through which method general business would be immediately improved.

7. The Federal reserve agent to be appointed for each loan office to remain in charge of same and make the collections as provided, responsibility of the loans to be carried jointly by the Federal reserve system and the bank through whose cooperation the loans are to be made.

8. The Government assuming responsibility for 50 per cent of the amount loaned and retaining bank collateral for the other 50 per cent until funds are collected.

9. Each borrower of these funds to sign an application blank before a notary public detailing the use for which it is proposed to use the funds; and in case of approval of the application, then a contract to be signed in addition to the note for the loan, contract embodying the use for which the borrower would agree to expend the funds.

10. It is understood that the appointee of the Federal reserve system would be responsible to the Federal reserve governor of that district for his actions and the proper administration of this fund, the local bank cooperating by the approval of proposed loans before the Federal relief agent would give final approval to same.

It might be found desirable to expand this financing service by either reducing the number to be served by each $500,000 fund to 150,000 population, or increasing the amount for a population of 250,000 to $750,000.

The reason for having a special representative of the Government in charge of the fund is the very great necessity for a broad-minded, unprejudiced administration of the fund which would place applicants on equal footing so far as possible.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 341) providing for the suspension of annual assessment work on mining claims held by location in the United States and Alaska, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 693) thereon.

Mr. STEIWER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4572) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine claims of certain bands or tribes of Indians residing in the State of Oregon, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 694) thereon.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 4107. An act to amend section 3 of an act, as amended, entitled "An act making it a misdemeanor in the District of Columbia to abandon or willfully neglect to provide for the support and maintenance by any person of his wife or his or her minor children in destitute or necessitous circumstances," approved June 10, 1926 (Rept. No. 695); and

H. R. 7305. An act to permit construction, maintenance, and use of certain pipe lines for petroleum and petroleum products (Rept. No. 696).

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED

Mr. VANDENBERG (for Mr. WATERMAN), from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 14th instant that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

S. 3584. An act to require all insurance corporations formed under the provisions of Chapter XVIII of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia to maintain their principal offices and places of business within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

S. 4193. An act to authorize the issuance of bonds by the St. Thomas Harbor Board, Virgin Islands, for the acquisition or construction of a graving or dry dock; and

S. J. Res. 36. Joint resolution to change the name of the island of "Porto Rico" to "Puerto Rico."

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MORRISON:

A bill (S. 4666) relating to the rate of interest on loans to veterans under the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. VANDENBERG:

A bill (S. 4667) to amend the act approved March 3, 1927, entitled "An act to permit the granting of Federal aid in respect of certain roads and bridges"; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. THOMAS of Idaho:

A bill (S. 4668) granting an increase of pension to Alexander Wilson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FRAZIER:

A bill (S. 4669) granting a pension to Rosalia Lange; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A bill (S. 4670) granting a pension to George M. Terrill (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NORBECK:

A bill (S. 4671) to extend the benefits of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, approved January 22, 1932, to the banks and agricultural credit corporations of Porto Rico; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. BINGHAM:

A bill (S. 4672) for the relief of Francis M. Johnston; to the Committee on Claims.

REVENUE AND TAXATION—AMENDMENTS

Mr. SHIPSTEAD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10236, the revenue and taxation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 245, after line 10, insert the following:

"(9) Copra; hempstead; palm nuts; kapok seed; palm nut kernels; tung nuts; rapeseed; perilla seed; sesame seed; rubber seed, 1 cent per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

"(10) Coconut oil, the product of the Philippine Islands; palm oil; perilla and sweet almond oil; tung oil; herring oil; pilchard oil; whale oil; seal oil; sperm oil, crude, 2 cents per pound. The tax on the article described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

"(11) Palm-kernel oil; sunflower oil; sesame oil; rapeseed oil; olive oil; all the foregoing if in inedible form, 2 cents per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

Mr. NORBECK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10236, the revenue and taxation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 245, between lines 10 and 11, insert the following new paragraph:

"(9) Butter, 8 cents per pound; oleomargarine and other butter substitutes, 8 cents per pound. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles."

RADIO DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article appearing in the Federal News of Saturday, May 14, 1932, describing the activities of the Radio Division of the Department of Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

STAFF OF UNITED STATES RADIO DIVISION HAS MANY COMPLEX DUTIES—PERSONNEL OF AGENCY INCLUDES CORPS OF TECHNICIANS WHO ARE "POLICEMEN OF THE AIR" AND MAINTAIN ORDER IN VAST AND INVOLVED USE OF THE RADIO

Behind the great and growing use of the air as a medium of transmitting radio signals and broadcasts rests the activity of the staff of the Radio Division of the Department of Commerce, comprised of men who handle a wide range of technical details and the administrative personnel in which direction of the agency's work is centered.

A review of activities by W. D. Terrell, head of the division, reveals the importance of the work done by Federal workers on duty with the unit. This review, dealing largely with work done by the division during the last fiscal year, furnishes an indication of the continuing duties of the agency, both in Washington and in the field.

INSPECTION MADE

Inspections of the radio installations on ships are made to determine that the apparatus is in good working order and in charge of competent operators. It has for its purpose, of course, the protection of life and property.

Many inspections of the radio installations on ships and the inspection of radio station on land are performed under authority of the radio act of 1927. Such inspections are in the nature of a general survey of the stations for the purpose of determining if the station inspected complies in every respect with the information furnished by the owner of the station in his application for a radio-station license. The inspection includes verification as to the power used by the station, the wave lengths, or frequencies, to which the station may be adjusted, type of apparatus, location of station, and numerous other details.

TEST CARS USED

The radio stations to be inspected are situated in all parts of the United States, Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico. It is not possible with the limited inspection force of the Radio Division to inspect regularly the more than 26,000 licensed radio-transmitting stations.

With radio test cars, fully equipped with field-strength-measuring apparatus and mobile secondary standards of frequency, it was possible during the past year to make a large number of field-strength surveys to determine the service areas of broadcast stations and ascertain whether or not they render good broadcast service to radio listeners in their respective areas. With these cars it has also been possible to ascertain the energy in harmonics from broadcast and other stations, with a view to the elimination of these parasitic radiations.

Although the monitoring stations at Boston, Baltimore, Atlanta, New Orleans, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, Oreg., Detroit, Chicago, and Grand Island maintain watches less than 8 hours out of the 24 during working days, these stations reported 76,447 frequency measurements during the last fiscal year, as compared with 45,695 for the previous year.

The construction work on the large frequency monitoring station at Grand Island, Nebr., was practically finished during the fiscal year. The Diesel-engine-driven generators were installed in the power house and placed in operation, and frequency-measurement work was begun.

MANY STATIONS REACHED

Highly accurate frequency measurements are being made daily on radio stations in the United States and foreign countries. Telephone and telegraph stations in Argentina, Austria, Australia, Brazil, Belgium, Canada, Chile, Cuba, Colombia, Costa Rica, China, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, England, Egypt, France, Germany, Hawaii, Holland, Indo-China, Italy, Japan, Java, Madagascar, Morocco, Mexico, Norway, New Caledonia, New Zealand, Portugal, Philippine Islands, Panama, Persia, Russia, Spain, Syria, Venezuela, and other countries are received and measured daily. At the present time, due to insufficient personnel, the station is in operation only 16 hours daily; thus full advantage can not be taken of all the facilities at the station for making frequency measurements and other observations.

At the end of the fiscal year 167 different radio stations located in foreign countries had been measured, a total of 789 measurements being made on these stations. It is interesting to note that a very large number of these stations failed to maintain their assigned operating frequencies and in many cases were observed to be causing interference with radio telephone and telegraph stations operating in the United States. In addition to the foreign stations measured 2,240 measurements were made at Grand Island on 650 individual radio telephone and telegraph stations within the continental limits of the United States.

It requires nine skilled radio engineers to intercept and measure the signals from radio telephone and telegraph stations, each watch, at Grand Island. These watches, at the present time, are of eight hours' duration, and sufficient personnel should be provided so as to make available the required number of engineers for each watch, and to have the station in operation 24 hours each day. If this were done, it would be possible to make 2,000 or more accurate measurements per month, in addition to making other observations, such as channel congestion, material broadcast, improper use of frequency assignment, and other special tests.

ENCOURAGING INCREASE

There has been an encouraging increase in the use of radio in the aeronautical service. The records of the division show that licenses were issued to 99 aeronautical stations and 17 permits have been issued for construction of aeronautical stations during the last fiscal year. When these stations are constructed there will be a total of 116 such stations as compared with 66 stations and 23 outstanding construction permits last year. Last year there were 215 planes equipped with radio. There are now 303. The above figures do not include Government stations.

The ground stations are spaced along the airways so as to insure continuous communication between aircraft in flight and the station on the ground. There is an average separation between ground stations of 200 miles so that the maximum range to be covered in communication is approximately 100 miles. Experience has shown that with this fairly close spacing of transmitters reliable communication can be conducted under any but the most adverse conditions.

Radiotelephone apparatus is most generally used. The aircraft radiophone installations are extremely simple and are controlled by a single push button so that the pilot may operate the system with a minimum of effort. Trailing antennas such as necessary when longer wave lengths are used have been eliminated, making it possible for aircraft to engage in transmission while on the ground as well as in the air. The traffic handled consists of messages relating to safety, position reports, meteorological reports, arrivals and departures, and anything pertinent to the movement of aircraft.

The past fiscal year showed increasing interest on the part of amateurs. In 1929 there were 16,829 licensed amateur radio stations, in 1930 there were 18,994, and this year there are 22,739. These figures indicate that the amateurs are by far the largest users of transmitting radio stations in the United States. In addition to the licenses issued to the amateur stations, correspondence with the radio division shows that there are more young men making inquiry with reference to obtaining such licenses than in any previous year. It is believed that this growing interest may be attributed to the use of the radiotelephone by amateurs.

AMATEURS' ACTIVITIES

"The amateurs have given much attention to attaining frequency precision and control of their apparatus," Mr. Terrell states. "The standard-frequency system sponsored by the Radio Relay League, and inaugurated last year on a nation-wide basis, has been continued during the fiscal year just ended. As high as 300 calibrations a month have been reported from this service. The benefits derived from these standard transmissions sent by the amateurs themselves are not confined to the amateurs in this country. It is reported that many foreign amateurs, particularly those in South Africa and Australia, have been utilizing these transmissions on the higher frequencies.

"With such a service regularly available, considerable interest has been evinced in the popularization of measuring equipment of a standard comparable in accuracy and stability to the transmission, and yet within the financial and constructional abilities of the average amateur. The American Radio Relay League reports that their laboratory work has resulted in the development of dynatron oscillator equipment which fulfills these specifications, affording tolerances well within 0.01 per cent and still easily constructed and calibrated.

GOOD EFFECTS CITED

"With such equipment available, together with the transmission supplied by the standard frequency stations, large numbers of amateurs have built and now possess measuring apparatus equal to that in many laboratories. The good effects have been apparent. In line with their long-established self-policing policy, the amateurs have created a system of official observing stations, the amateur stations so appointed being equipped with reasonably accurate measuring apparatus for regularly observing and reporting any off-frequency violators among the amateur ranks. The American Radio Relay League reports that approximately 100 appointments have been made.

"The communications possibilities of frequencies on the order of 56,000 kilocycles have been examined and considerable development work accomplished in the design of radio-telephone transmitters and special receivers of the superregenerative type to work on these frequencies.

"While no major emergency occurred in the United States during the last fiscal year to enable the amateurs to participate in the storm relief work for which they have been noted in recent years, greater cooperation has been afforded to more than a dozen expeditions sailing from the United States, and increased activity is reported in connection with the Naval Radio Reserve and the Army Amateur Radio System.

"The monitoring stations of the division are regularly engaged in measuring the frequencies of amateur stations. Comparatively few violations have been found and only a few have been penalized for such violations. It seems evident that the amateurs realize that their future success and public good will depend upon the operation of their stations in an orderly manner, having due regard for other users, including the broadcast listeners. When a new amateur enters the field, his transmissions are usually observed by the older amateurs who take such action as may be necessary to bring him in line with the self-policing policy of the organization."

PROHIBITION AND ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I am constrained to address the Senate briefly at this time on the subjects which I feel should be emphasized, particularly right now, and which I am equally sure are foremost in the thoughts of the citizens of our Nation to-day.

When the present Congress convened last December the United States, as we all know, was in the throes of a business depression and economic crisis unparalleled in our history. Millions of unemployed men and women were walking the streets. More millions were working on part time and were confronted with the imminent danger of being laid off altogether. The American people, who, especially in years of plenty, have been prone to consider their National Government as a vague and distant agency, were just beginning to turn their eyes toward Washington as the one bright ray of hope in an otherwise dark and discouraging outlook. They were beginning to turn to their National Government as the one reliable bulwark that stood between them and a total economic breakdown.

The several States were, and still are, doing their utmost for unemployment; but their resources in many instances were beginning to show depletion, and the cure lay deeper anyway than simply the ability to provide charity; for the self-respecting American people do not want charity; what they want is an opportunity to get work—not alms. Relief in the form of immediate and greatly lessened governmental expenditures, relief in the form of confidence born of a balanced Budget, help in the form of some sort of cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in unemployment emergency relief were looked for by the American people.

Since the convening of Congress in December conditions have not improved materially, if at all; and, despite such reconstruction measures as have been enacted by the Congress in the meantime, which unquestionably have been both helpful and timely, our responsibility has not been as yet fully discharged by any means.

The depression, moreover, is not, in my opinion, being prolonged by any lack of currency and will not be relieved by any increase in currency. The depression is being prolonged, as I see it, by a lack of confidence generally. And Congress can promote the recovery of confidence only by providing immediately for the effective balancing of the Budget by drastic economies of expenditures on the one hand and levying such increases in taxes on the other as may then be necessary, which, while placing the greater proportion of the burden on those best able to bear the load, will not cripple any individual industry or business.

In other words, Mr. President, if Congress could go to the American people to-morrow with definite economies on a large scale actually effected, and with a plan of unemployment relief and with a proper tax bill, I venture the assertion that the psychological effect upon the country would immediately be reflected in an entirely different outlook on the part of the people, an outlook which of itself would do more to cure the ills of the day than anything else could possibly do.

Mr. President, I believe that prohibition is definitely involved in the present economic situation. On every side we hear increasing dissatisfaction over the conditions that prohibition has brought about. Certainly the success or failure of any legislation can be gaged only by the extent and character of the results achieved, and no one can say that the manufacture, transportation, and sale of alcoholic beverages have been in any real sense prohibited by prohibition.

I have, Mr. President, before me statistics which the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York recently made public in regard to the prohibition question. And I would like to cite a few of these statistics to the Senate:

In 1910, 29,710 prisoners were committed to the Federal and State prisons, while in the year 1928, 55,746 were committed to Federal and State prisons.

The same authority, which bases its statistics upon the Government's Statistical Abstract for the year 1931, shows that prisoners received from courts in Federal and State prisons increased between 1910 and 1928 from 32 prisoners for each 100,000 of population to 48 prisoners for each 100,000 of population.

The same authority quotes the Moderation League (Inc.) of New York in its survey of 403 specific towns and cities in this country as placing the arrests for drunkenness in 1914 at 531,574 and in 1926 at 559,074.

The Association Against the Prohibition Amendment reports that in 371 towns and cities in 1920 the average arrests for intoxication were approximately 70½ persons for each 100,000 of population, while in the same 371 towns and cities in 1928, the average arrests for intoxication were approximately 151⅓ for each 100,000 of population.

Prohibition has brought about one of the most dangerous and baffling problems with which legitimate American business has ever had to deal, namely, the racket. In alarmingly increasing numbers businesses are being subject to this form of persecution. In this connection, I quote again from the survey of conditions under prohibition conducted by the chamber of commerce in New York, in which it is estimated that Chicago pays an annual tribute to the racketeer of $200,000,000, New York City between $200,000,000 and $300,000,000, and other great centers of population in proportion.

The Census Bureau reports that divorces in which intoxication was listed as the sole cause increased 133 per cent from 1922 to 1929, as against a population increase of 11 per cent.

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. reports that deaths from alcoholism among its policyholders increased from 1.4 per 100,000 persons in 1919 to 3.4 per 100,000 persons in 1929.

Now, as to the purely financial aspect of the problem, it has cost the people of the United States $370,000,000 from 1920 to 1931 to try to enforce prohibition. And, as shown by the Crusaders in a survey recently appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the revenue derived by the Federal Government for alcoholic beverages in 1917 was $284,000,000 out of a total Federal revenue of $1,037,000,000 or nearly one-fourth of the entire cost of operating the Federal Government in that year.

In 1917 the tax on alcoholic beverages paid nearly one-third of the cost of operating the Federal Government. Think, Mr. President, what this revenue would mean to the Nation now! Consider also what a totally different financial condition the Treasury Department would reflect to-day had the Nation not been deprived of the $12,000,000,000 of revenue lost since prohibition went into effect.

But enough of statistics, Mr. President, though I could go on to much greater length reciting figures in substantiation of the fact that prohibition is not only an experiment we can no longer afford economically but is an experiment that has proven to be, in my judgment, anyway, harmful both civically and morally. In saying this, Mr. President, I do not bear any brief for the old saloon. I am glad it has been relegated to a deserved oblivion, for which I cheerfully give prohibition any credit due. I do say, however, that the speak-easy of to-day is an even greater menace than was the old saloon which it supplanted.

To sum up, Mr. President, I believe that if this Congress would courageously face the issue of prohibition, the problem of drastic and immediate economies in government, and of such increase, if any, in taxation as may then be necessary to balance the Budget, almost overnight we would see a return in this country of the confidence which, as I have said before, I feel, alone can cure our national economic problems.

In conclusion, I have the temerity to urge that the Congress proceed from now on with all possible dispatch and effectiveness to the end that this session, of necessity so harassed with the uncertain, may be concluded at the earliest possible date.

POLITICAL ACTIVITIES OF POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. HARRISON obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. AUSTIN in the chair). The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Nebraska desires to speak, I do not care to interfere with him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi yields to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me we ought not to pass unnoticed the speech which was made by Mr. Glover, Second Assistant Postmaster General, at a convention of postmasters held in the State of Missouri on Saturday last. I quote from his speech as reported by the New York Times, which is the same, in substance, as the report in practically all the newspapers; and so I take it that there is no doubt but that the speech was made as indicated in the news accounts. This dispatch from Springfield, Mo., dated May 14, says:

> Any Missouri postmaster who does not wish to "get out on the firing line" in support of President Hoover was invited to-day by W. Irving Glover, Second Assistant Postmaster General, to resign.
> "I'll be back in Washington Monday," Mr. Glover said, "and I'll be glad at that time to take the resignations of any of you postmasters who don't want to do it."
>
> * * * * * * *
> "You are a part of this administration," he reminded the postmasters. "When you hear anybody assailing that man Hoover remember what I said, or go and read a book, and answer them. As long as you do that you are filling the job of postmaster."

Further on he said:

> As for a suggestion that America to-day needs a great new leader, Mr. Glover said, "We don't want a leader—we've had one for years."
>
> He reminded the postmasters that this depression has not been accompanied by such strikes and riots as the one of 1894, and that England had sent MacDonald, France had sent Briand, and Italy had sent Grandi to America to confer with Mr. Hoover as a world leader.
> "We've got a leader," he declared. "If we don't stand back of that man, Herbert Hoover, regardless of party—then God help this country!"

Mr. President, in behalf of millions of patriotic people who desire that our Post Office Department be placed as nearly as possible upon a nonpartisan business basis, I want to protest against that speech of the Second Assistant Postmaster General. I want to denounce it, as it ought to be denounced, as unpatriotic. I do not believe any man in this civilized day wants to make of the Post Office Department a great partisan political machine. I had supposed we had passed by those barbarous, iniquitous times; I had supposed that we had partially placed our Post Office Department, the greatest institution of its kind in the world, upon a plane beyond politics—dirty politics, unreasonable and unjustifiable politics—and I believe that the utterances of this man Glover, the major general of the "pie-counter brigade," are an insult to our Government, to our Post Office Department, and to all the patriotic people of our country.

What does it mean when one coming from Washington, near the top of that great department, tells the postmasters, brazenly and openly, that it is their duty to become politicians first and postmasters second? What does it mean to all the thousands and the hundreds of thousands of employees of this Government? These employees, these postmasters, are not ignoramuses. They can read between the lines. They know what that kind of a speech means. Reduced to plain English it says, "Unless you go out in this campaign and make a partisan fight for a certain man for President of the United States you will lose your jobs." It is notice to every other employee everywhere under the authority of our flag that unless he follows the dictates of the pie-counter spokesman and statesman he will either lose his job on some pretense of a technical nature, or on the expiration of his term he will stand no show for reappointment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has just referred to the declaration of the Second Assistant Postmaster General made publicly to postmasters that unless they do support the candidacy of President Hoover they will lose their positions in the public service. I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he does not believe, in view of that statement, that they will certainly lose them if they do go out and take the status of partisans and there follows a change of administration?

Mr. NORRIS. That would be the natural result, I should think. I do not want to see that brought about. I have long advocated that the Post Office Department ought to be taken out of politics. Such a proclamation and such an idea, I think, receives the approval of all men who want to put our Government, and particularly that great department, on an efficient basis and raise it above the mire and dirt of men who have no interest in our Government or in the welfare of our people except to get the jobs.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield further to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Pretense has been made of placing postmasters within a kind of civil service; that is to say, the selections are presumably made as the result of an examination held under the rules of the department and the civil service. Yet, notwithstanding that fact, postmasters are being urged and required to make partisan campaign contributions. In some instances, particularly in the South, they are denied appointments, no matter how well qualified, unless they have contributed or manifest their willingness to contribute to a partisan campaign fund.

I agree with the Senator from Nebraska. It is a disgrace to the Government and a disgrace to this administration for one high in authority to intimidate postmasters in the way that was attempted by Mr. Glover.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course the intimidation, as I said before, does not stop at postmasters.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no.

Mr. NORRIS. Where is there an official holding office but who knows that what is said to the man who is holding down a post-office job applies to him?

Mr. President, I do not desire now to take the time of the Senate to enter into a discussion upon what I believe to be the principles that should govern the appointment of postmasters and other officials. It is sufficient to say that we have passed laws making partisan political activity a crime in some instances and making it a sufficient reason for the discharge from public service of men who debase their positions and make political headquarters of their offices, which ought to be open to all the people, regardless of party.

I only want to say in conclusion that if the President of the United States wants to retain the confidence of the patriotic people of this country, he will repudiate, in the name of his administration, these sentiments expressed by the Second Assistant Postmaster General. He will not only repudiate them but, if he does what I believe is his duty, Mr. Glover himself will be a private citizen before the sun sets to-night.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Mississippi desires to speak on the bill, I would prefer that he do so.

Mr. HARRISON. I intend to speak on the bill, but I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I shall be very brief in what I have to say. I feel the details explanatory of the proposal before the Senate have been fully presented.

I intend to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]. It is a drastic piece of legislation; but it seems to me that it is no more so than is necessary to meet the situation as it is now presented. It seems to me also that in view of the circumstances it is not unjust.

We have been advised by the Commander in Chief of the Army, and we all recognize it to be more or less true, that the situation which now confronts us is really that of war. All the powers of the Government are to be organized and enlisted for the purpose of controlling and directing the situation in the best interest of the public. It is necessary, therefore, that we call upon those who have the means to contribute to the Treasury of the Government in order that we may do those things which are necessary to be done.

I feel, therefore, that the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, while drastic, is necessary in the situation which now faces us. Furthermore, the tax proposed to be levied by this amendment is no more onerous than other taxes—not so much so, in my judgment—to be found in the bill. There are other taxes levied which will cause more worry, more distress, and possibly more actual suffering, than can be brought about by the amendment to which I refer. This tax can be paid with less sacrifice than other taxes found in the bill.

We are passing a tax bill which represents, not what the Congress would like to do, but what the Congress feels under the necessity of doing. Those who have great incomes must respond in accordance with their ability in the present situation. We will levy in this bill taxes which will be collected not in accordance with ability to pay, as may be said of this amendment.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the outlay of this Government in the next year, in my judgment, is going to be heavier than has been in the thought of those who framed the tax bill. Even if we succeed in passing a bill economizing on the expenditures of the Government, nevertheless the demands which are going to be made upon the Government during the next year will be, in my judgment, in excess of anything which has been yet proposed.

We are now, at this late hour, about to take up the question of Federal aid to the unemployed. Regardless of the propositions which have been made with reference to self-liquidating public improvements, and whatever there may be in that proposal, we must realize that heavier demands are going to be made upon the Government in order to organize and put into execution anything like an effective Federal unemployment program.

I call attention at this point to the statement made by the railroad brotherhoods in their plea to the President last Saturday. It is indicative of the problem which confronts us and which has confronted us for the last six months:

> Mr. President, we come to you representing large groups of laboring people of America. We have suffered for years from the deadly contraction which has been steadily throttling business activity and curtailing the movement of cars over our railroads.

Various authorities place the number of unemployed in the country at approximately 8,000,000, and the number is increasing daily. There are on the average about three additional people dependent on the support of each one of the unemployed.

In the last few years employment has declined over 30 per cent, pay rolls have declined over 50 per cent, and the prices of farm products have declined over 55 per cent—and it is getting worse. The total pay of railroad workers alone has been cut by over $1,000,000,000.

* * * * * * *

Within a short time the Congress of the United States will adjourn in order to have time to deal with political matters. Mr. President, we have come here to tell you that unless something is done to provide employment and relieve distress among the families of the unemployed we can not be responsible for the orderly operation of the railroads of this country—that we will refuse to take the responsibility for the disorder which is sure to arise if conditions continue.

Nor will we accept responsibility for the demands that will surely be made upon representatives of the Government and which we predict will be more far-reaching than any yet made, including the dole.

It would be with great reluctance that those we represent would ask for a dole. On the other hand, Mr. President, what other alternative is there available? Everything else suggested has either failed or has been denied. If something is not immediately done we will be obliged to demand a dole.

Mr. President, the railroad brotherhoods represent a body of working men who are not easily disturbed. They are men of character, men of thought and reading, and far from being in any sense agitators. I regard this statement made by the railroad brotherhoods to the President as conclusive of the proposition that the Federal Government must now assume its part in dealing with the question of unemployment. The task is ours, it will require demands on the Treasury to meet it, and the large incomes should respond to the emergency.

We can not longer expect the States or the cities or the local communities to deal with a situation which is national in all its significance, and which, in my judgment, must be dealt with as a national problem. In order to do that we must necessarily incur additional expense, regardless of what the plan may be. Some outlay upon the part of the Government must necessarily follow; and we had just as well face it, acknowledge the responsibility, and proceed to the completion of a Federal unemployment program.

While I am speaking upon this subject I may say that I trust that the committee which is now dealing with the question of unemployment will not bring before this body a bill or a program founded primarily on the idea of loans to States or cities. So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to the Federal Government shirking its responsibility and undertaking to lend to the States or the cities money with which to discharge its grave responsibility. The Federal Government owes a duty itself direct to the citizen. The responsibility is now ours, and we must meet it directly. The States have already incurred heavy responsibility, the cities have incurred heavy responsibility, and it would not be sufficient for the Government to do nothing more than to provide for loans to the States or cities.

In addition to that, Mr. President, when we make a loan to a State or to a city, we pass it beyond the power of the National Government to control. The taxing power is theirs. We can not enforce collection, we can not control the question of collection, and we can not control the question of responsibility for payment. It is a dangerous, inefficient, and unfair program, this program of loaning to the States or cities.

Furthermore, as to some cities in the United States where suffering is intense, so far as I am concerned, I would be unwilling to vote a dollar to be distributed by the class of officials now in control in those cities. I am not willing, in view of the awful conditions, to intrust them with Federal money.

The responsibility is ours, and for that reason I have no hesitancy whatever in laying even so heavy a burden upon those who have the incomes and can meet the demands of the Government. In an hour of national distress, when millions are hungry, great incomes must not complain of the heavy hand of the Government.

It is war, it is a contest for the preservation of the Government; but, furthermore, it is a contest for the preservation of the character, the physical and moral well-being of our people, and in that the Federal Government has a direct interest.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I have heard the Senator with the greatest interest and sympathy. I would like to ask him how he would have the Federal Government distribute this direct relief, if it is not done through the States or the cities.

Mr. BORAH. I would be perfectly willing to have the Government cooperate with the States or the cities. What I am opposing is our lending money to the cities or the States to be distributed without any direction or control by the Federal Government itself.

Mr. COPELAND. Has the Senator made any study as to the amount of money needed? I have thought that $250,000,000 or $300,000,000 is hardly a drop in the bucket in the conditions of starvation and unemployment which now exist.

Mr. BORAH. I have given some thought to the amount. I quite agree with the Senator that $250,000,000 would not be sufficient if Congress is to adjourn soon.

Mr. COPELAND. I have heard the Senator with great interest and sympathy. I am sure we must do something, because all the advices I have indicate that there is an increasing need of relief in the homes of this country.

Mr. BORAH. There has been such a need for six months. We are six months behind.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will yield further——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. There has been no lack of effort on my part to meet the responsibility which is ours.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I had no personal reference to the Senator.

Mr. President, we have for our great objective, in the passing of a tax bill, the balancing of the Budget. That has been made a slogan throughout the country. It is a proper thing to do. We should always keep that objective in mind. It is the goal for which we should strive. But we delude ourselves if we think we are going to balance the Budget unless we do something more than pass a tax bill.

Mr. President, with the constant fall of prices, and diminishing returns, it is impossible for anyone to give any reasonable estimate as to what will be required in order to balance the Budget. We may make a paper balance but no real balance. If we can not before we adjourn work out some reasonable plan which will stay the fall of prices and stay deflation; if we can not, in other words, aid the farmer and the business man to balance their budgets, this talk of our balancing our Budget, in my judgment, will never be realized. There is something more to balancing the Budget than estimating revenues and stopping at that. If prices continue to fall, incomes will be disappointing. We have a vastly more difficult problem before us than merely passing a tax bill.

While prices are falling, while deflation continues, while the returns to the business man continue to decrease, we may make every reasonable effort in that direction, but we can not be certain that we shall succeed.

My own view is that, in addition to levying taxes, and in addition to the curtailment of expenses, we must before we adjourn take up the question of stabilizing of prices and stabilizing the American dollar. The gold dollar is no longer an honest dollar. It is no longer a dollar to be trusted. The farmer may go to bed to-night with a thousand dollar mortgage, and, by reason of the fluctuating value of the gold dollar, he may wake up in the morning with a marked per cent added to his mortgage indebtedness. Unless we are willing to take the responsibility, either through the Federal reserve system or by some other method which the Congress may point out, or through an international conference, which I regard as most sound, to stay the constant fall of prices, we might as well abandon all thought of a definite balancing of the Budget, or of maintaining the balance for any length of time.

I read a line here from Prof. E. W. Kemmerer, who is an advocate of the gold standard under all circumstances and at all times. He says:

> The world sooner or later must either learn how to stabilize the gold standard or devise some other monetary standard to take its place.

"Some time, sooner or later." How many suicides must be registered, how many people must go insane, how many farms must be sold under the hammer, how many businesses must close before the "some time" will arrive. Without stability in your measure of value, business can not recover and debts can not be paid.

> There is probably no defect in the world's economic organization to-day more serious than the fact that we use as our unit of value not a thing with a fixed value but a fixed weight of gold with a widely varying value. In a little less than half a century here in the United States we have seen our yardstick of value, namely, the value of a gold dollar, exhibit the following gyrations: From 1879 to 1896 it rose 27 per cent; from 1896 to 1920 it fell 70 per cent; from 1920 to September, 1927, it rose 56 per cent. If, figuratively speaking, we say that the yardstick of value was 36 inches long in 1879, when the United States returned to the gold standard, then it was 46 inches long in 1896, 13.5 inches long in 1920, and is 21 inches long to-day.

This was written some time ago, and the last figure is not absolutely correct under present circumstances.

The business world can not continue under that condition of affairs. There will ultimately be a collapse. If we have no remedy for the fluctuating value of gold which is now in hiding, now being hoarded, which cowardly retreats the minute trouble comes, it will be impossible for the business world or agriculture to recover, and the balancing of the Budget will be an iridescent dream. Business must know where it is. When a man incurs a debt he must know that what he agrees to pay is the amount he is to pay.

It has been said in answer to those who favor doing something for silver that silver fluctuates in value. I make this challenge, after some investigation which I think warrants me in doing so, that silver has never fluctuated in value to a greater degree than gold has, except when it has been legislated against. If we take the course of gold, in its value and its purchasing power, and that of silver, from the time of Abraham down to recent years, we find that the fluctuating value of silver has not been greater than that of gold at any time.

It may not be that action in regard to the silver question is the solution of better basic money, and I do not contend it is the sole solution, but if that is not the solution then the Federal Reserve Board, with its capacity to regulate, discount, and rediscount rates and the eligibility of securities, should undertake to do more than it has yet undertaken to do in order to stabilize the value of the American dollar. I believe myself in an international monetary conference. I think it the safest and surest way to deal with the question, but that it must be dealt with, who can doubt?

Therefore, Mr. President, in levying drastic taxes as are proposed in the pending amendment, we would be doing no more than calmly meeting the situation as it is, and as it now confronts us. And even so, with the levies which we shall make, as I trust, we shall not be able to meet the situation in the near future unless we associate with the tax program some plan for stabilizing the American dollar. While we are asking so much of the taxpayer we must provide him with a stable measure of value.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I want to address myself to the pending tax bill, and particularly to the pending amendment and other amendments which will be offered to the particular section of the bill under consideration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield for that purpose?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Davis	La Follette	Shortridge
Bankhead	Dickinson	Logan	Smith
Barbour	Dill	Long	Smoot
Bingham	Frazier	McGill	Steiwer
Borah	Glenn	McNary	Stephens
Bratton	Gore	Metcalf	Thomas, Idaho
Bulkley	Hale	Morrison	Thomas, Okla.
Bulow	Harrison	Moses	Trammell
Byrnes	Hayden	Neely	Tydings
Capper	Hebert	Norris	Vandenberg
Caraway	Howell	Nye	Wagner
Carey	Hull	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Cohen	Johnson	Patterson	Watson
Connally	Jones	Reed	Wheeler
Coolidge	Kean	Robinson, Ark.	White
Copeland	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.
Couzens	Keyes	Sheppard
Cutting	King	Shipstead

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to submit an amendment and ask that it be printed in the RECORD, and printed and lie on the table. There is an error in the draft of the bill as reported and this is to correct it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GORE'S amendment to the amendment of the committee is as follows:

> In section 12e, page 16, line 13, strike out "individual for personal services" and insert "officer, director, or employee of a corporation for personal services to such corporation."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suppose that no committee in the House or Senate was ever confronted with a more difficult task than were the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate in the drafting of the tax bill now pending before this body. Of course, some newspapers have criticized and some leaders of thought have found fault with the action of the House and Senate committees.

When conditions are sound and when prosperity hovers over the country it is not a difficult matter to reduce taxes. There may be some differences of opinion as to where to grant the reduction, but everyone likes to vote for a reduction, and so it is always a popular action of legislation. But when we are confronted, as we have been at this time, with the necessity of increasing taxes in an amount in excess of $1,000,000,000, it matters not what method we may employ, it matters not what reservoir we may tap to get the money, we are going to encounter violent opposition and receive numerous protests. But if we are right in the premise that it is necessary for the welfare of the country and for the restoration of economic conditions to pass a tax bill involving an amount of upward of $1,000,000,000 in increased taxes, then we should, as I am sure we will, meet the necessities of the case courageously and not give in to every protest or every objection that might be made.

There is not a Senator here but dislikes to impose an additional tax upon incomes, upon business, upon places of amusement, and upon any of the vast number of things that are carried in the Senate proposal or that were carried in the House proposal. We would like to pass from our lips the cup and refuse to drink; but if we are deserving of a place in the American Congress as supposed leaders of our people, then we should not shirk the responsibility even though it might mean political estrangement of friends or even political defeat.

So far as I am concerned, when I made up my mind that the Budget should be balanced and that it was one of the lanes that necessarily we must travel in order to lift the country out of the bog and restore confidence and start business on the upgrade, then I intended to follow that path no matter what the consequences were. I have received letters from my constituents protesting against this and that tax. I have had to write friends of a lifetime, both personal and political, and tell them that I had to vote a certain way, and I have told them that I intended to vote that certain way. Senators in my presence now, who served with me on the Finance Committee, know that when other members of the committee, whether of my own party or of the opposite party, voted not to impose this or that tax, I voted differently from them and cast my vote in the interest of raising the needed revenues to balance the Budget. I did not want to do it, but I would be unworthy of my place in this body, and certainly as a representative of this side of the aisle upon the Finance Committee, if I shirked my responsibility.

Of course, we differ as to the method of raising the needed money. My friend from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] in the committee and upon the floor has proposed to raise a very large amount by a method that would relieve the automobile people of increased taxes, and would permit an exemption from taxation to be made of admissions to theaters and other places of amusement. I have great respect for the Senator from Michigan. I think his conclusions are formed conscientiously and that he is prompted by what he thinks to be for the best interest of the country. But, much as I respect his views, I can not agree with him in the conclusions that he expressed before the committee and in his speech upon the floor of the Senate. He may be perfectly right. I may be all wrong. His business success perhaps should win for him more approval than mine.

But it does seem to me, Mr. President, in this time of economic depression, when few people are making any money, and when fortunes have been wiped out and capital becomes timorous, that I can not be entirely wrong. Of course, there are some incomes; yes; some people are receiving some income. If not, the country would be bankrupted pretty quickly. In that situation we would look to the future with no hope. But everyone within the sound of my voice knows that, generally speaking, we are in a depression of tremendous proportions, when business is hesitant, and when we must start again the wheels of industry if employment is to be had and if we are going to have any revival of business in the country. I can not believe that in such times as these the strong arm of the Government should be used in carrying out the cry of those who say, "We are going to take 77 cents out of every dollar that you make and put it in the Treasury of the United States." I can not believe that such a policy is going to make a business man feel very much like employing his capital in new and productive enterprises.

I have no fault to find with those Senators within the sound of my voice who want to take 100 per cent of a man's earnings or any other very high percentage, who believe it is going to start productive activity, that it is going to encourage the men of means to invest their capital to start the wheels of industry moving again. That is what we did in war times when the country was fired with patriotism and a desire to raise money in order to win the war.

When industries were making money, some of them making it as they had never done before, it was easy to collect taxes; it was thought perfectly proper to collect 80 cents out of a dollar in those times. But these are peace times; these are times when there is no prosperity in the country; these are times when we are looking for some ray of hope that business may again start and that labor may again be employed.

To my Democratic colleagues here I desire to quote an expression of a great man, one whom I honored and was glad to follow, whose memory is still alive in the hearts of the American people—Woodrow Wilson. He made the statement not many years ago, in one of his last messages to Congress, December 2, 1919; it was when he was trying to influence the Congress to reduce taxes and asking for a revision and simplification of our tax laws. Here is what he said:

> The Congress might well consider whether the higher rates of income and profits taxes can in peace times be effectively productive of revenue, and whether they may not, on the contrary, be destructive of business activity and productive of waste and inefficiency. There is a point at which in peace times high rates of income and profits taxes discourage energy, remove the incentive to new enterprises, encourage extravagant expenditures, and produce industrial stagnation, with consequent unemployment and other attendant evils.

Democratic Secretaries of the Treasury time after time gave utterance to similar expressions. In 1924 the platform of the Democratic Party, expressing similar views, said this:

> We refer to the Democratic revenue measure passed by the last Congress as distinguished from the Mellon tax plan as an illustration of the policy of the Democratic Party. We first made a flat reduction of 25 per cent upon the tax on all incomes payable this year, and then we so changed the proposed Mellon plan as to eliminate taxes upon the poor, reduce them upon moderate incomes, and, in a lesser degree, upon the incomes of multi-millionaires. We hold that all taxes are unnecessarily high, and pledge ourselves to further reductions.

No, Mr. President; my party has never believed in taking everything a man makes. The fathers of this Republic believed in no such idea, and I would not be devoted to it if it did. The Democratic Party believes in offering every incentive to a man to make and earn and live honestly in this day and time. This is a land of opportunity that prescribes no limit as to where a man may go or how much money he may make. My party has believed that wealth should bear the greater burden of taxation and that a man should pay according to his ability to pay. We have, however, stood in Congress time after time since 1918 fighting for a reduction in taxes, because we know that when we create a surplus in the Treasury by overtaxing the people we produce waste and extravagance, and it is wrong as a governmental principle.

Now, let us come down to the proposition of what is the very right thing to do, where we are going to draw the line in raising the income taxes, and what is the point of ability to pay. Let us trace, if you please, just for a moment, the history of the income tax law. In 1913 Congress enacted the first income tax law. We then imposed a normal income tax of 1 per cent, with a 6 per cent surtax. The surtax was not imposed until an income of $20,000 was reached. We carried the surtax up in 1916 until it reached 13 per cent, and we increased the normal tax to 2 per cent. In 1917 the normal tax was increased to 4 per cent and the surtax to 50 per cent. Then in time of war, when, of course, everybody was willing to pay, for the first and last time we imposed a normal tax running from 6 to 12 per cent and increased the surtax in the higher brackets to 65 per cent. Exemptions were lowered and earned-income features removed. My friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] now says, "Let us revert in these peace days to those days of war and exact the highest tax that was ever imposed upon the American people."

In 1921 and 1922 we changed the tax law; we reduced the income taxes. In 1924 we had a fight here upon the floor of the Senate on the proposition for reduction, but we reduced them still further. The Members on this side of the aisle at that time were fighting to relieve the little fellow more than were those on the other side of the Chamber. That was one of the issues of the campaign of 1924. Then in 1926 we reduced taxes still further. Yet my friend the Senator from Michigan would have Senators now support a normal tax of 6 and 12 per cent. That is what we inveighed against in 1921, 1922, 1924, and 1926. Of course, the method by which large sums of revenue may be obtained is to tax the small taxpayer tremendously in the imposition of normal taxes.

The House, which framed the pending bill, originally placed the normal taxes as at 2, 4, and 6 per cent, and those rates were only changed in the House through the efforts of a progressive Representative from New York, a splendid young Member of that body, who made a brave fight there for some changes in the bill. How was it changed as the result of his activities? Was the rate in the lower bracket changed? No. Did he seek to increase the 3 per cent rate to 4 per cent? No. Did he seek to increase the 4 per cent rate to 5 per cent? No. But he said in the last bracket the rate ought to be 7 per cent, and so the House adopted that rate, and the bill came to the Senate with rates of 2 per cent, 4 per cent, and 7 per cent. There was no suggestion made in all the tax fight in the House that the tax rates of 1918 ought at this time to be imposed upon the American people. If any Member of that body ever thought about doing so, he offered no such amendment. If any Member there had ever dreamed about it, he refrained from making it known.

The highest rate proposed in the House was under the so-called Swing amendment, which sought to carry the surtax rate up to 65 per cent, a plan which would have probably raised about $20,000,000 more. However, when the House came to vote on it on a roll call that proposal was defeated. In that amendment no effort was made to change the rates, as recommended by the House committee up to $100,000, it was merely to carry the rates from 40 per cent to 65 per cent on incomes above $100,000. Nobody offered a suggestion to make the normal taxes 6 per cent and 12 per cent at that time upon the American people. Nobody suggested that the exemption for dependents should be reduced $200; and yet that is what my distinguished friend from Michigan wants to do, and asks Senators on this side to follow him in doing.

Now let me tell you something, Mr. President. We have committees in this body, and the respective sides of the Chamber designate their representatives to go on those committees to try to arrive at right conclusions. If Members of the Senate do not have enough faith in their representatives thus selected they ought not to put them there.

As I said before, the Committee on Finance was confronted with a difficult task. We met the responsibility, and have brought to the Senate a bill in connection with the consideration of which partisanship never raised its head. In the committee no one ever heard of the Democratic or the Republican Party. Throughout the consideration of the bill I saw my good, young friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] stand like a man and vote as I did to impose taxes on this and taxes on that. He did not want to do it, but he was imbued with the same high motive that I was, namely, to balance the Budget.

We had our difficulties there because there were members of the committee who believed that if they could strike out the admission tax or strike out the automobile tax or strike out this tax or the other tax they could get the sales tax. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] comes within that classification. He made no excuses for it, but was open and courageous about it. I am telling the Senate the facts. I do not want to keep from my colleagues here anything that happened in the committee, because there were no secrets there; but some of us who were trying to perform our duty, voting for a tax upon this and a tax upon that in order to balance the Budget, had to combat many of the proposals made by my friend from Pennsylvania and other members of the committee, who held out to the end, in hope that at last, if the committee would strike out this and strike out that, they would at least be able to appease this group and that group and would be able to put on the sales tax as a matter of necessity.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will let me finish, because I am carrying on a line of thought.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Mr. HARRISON. However, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. I was merely going to ask the Senator a question. I was not in Washington at the time. Did the committee at one time vote to make the income tax 55 per cent on the larger incomes?

Mr. HARRISON. They never did.

Mr. LONG. They never did?

Mr. HARRISON. No. The newspapers which the Senator read must have been in error.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HARRISON. Did I not state the fact about it, I will ask the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COUZENS. I understood the Senator to say that the committee did not vote at one time for a 55 per cent rate on the higher incomes.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator from Louisiana to ask me if the committee did not vote for the 65 per cent rate?

Mr. LONG. No; a 55 per cent rate.

Mr. HARRISON. I misunderstood the Senator. I beg his pardon.

Mr. LONG. I was wondering what conscientious persuasion influenced the committee besides that of Mr. Ogden Mills when it went back to the 45 per cent rate.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will take his seat, I will tell him why. I will come to that directly and I will be glad to answer any further questions the Senator from Louisiana or any other Senator may desire to ask me.

So we had to fight these various elements in the committee. The sales tax offered no great bugaboo to me. I do not favor it and I do not expect to vote for it here. As a practical man I recognized that the House of Representatives had defeated a general sales tax by 70 votes on one occasion and by 70 votes on another occasion; that as a result a rather hectic situation arose over there; that when they defeated it, it threw the whole House into confusion and disturbed the whole situation in the country. The House of Representatives has been condemned, I think unjustifiably so; but I may say that if the Senate does not watch out it is going to get in the same confused situation as that which confronted the House. In my opinion, if we could pass this bill as it is written, we would do more to restore confidence at this particular time than by the passage of any other measure now before the Senate. So much for that.

In 1913, as I have said, we provided a normal tax of 1 per cent, with an increase to 6 per cent starting with incomes of $20,000. With only appreciable increases, those rates were retained until we got to 1918. Then we made the rates respectively 6 per cent and 12 per cent, but from that time on we have reduced the surtaxes. In 1922 the highest surtax rate was 55 per cent, and we reduced the normal taxes to 4 and 8 per cent. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan, as compared to the Senate committee recommendation, will include at least a million more taxpayers in this country.

I have some figures here that tell a very interesting story.

Taxpayers with net incomes of less than $10,000 pay $600,000,000 in local taxes. The same group of taxpayers pay $32,000,000 in income taxes. Taxpayers with net incomes of over $10,000 pay only $323,000,000 in local taxes, while they pay $800,000,000 in income taxes. In other words, the little man back at Gulfport, Miss., or out in the cities of your State, Mr. President (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair), is helping to make the wheels turn in his little community. These men do not make much. Some of them perhaps have incomes of three or four or five thousand dollars. They contribute toward civic improvements and civic advancement. They pay the local taxes—and God knows they are heavy enough now. I do not care whether you come from Idaho or Michigan or Mississippi, the local taxes are severe, and the American people are aroused and protesting to their local governments to save them. So why do we want to burden the little fellow in that way? What prompted the committee to act in that way?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HARRISON. I do.

Mr. LONG. I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator certainly is not following his intention, then.

Mr. LONG. In view of what the Senator is saying, with which I most heartily agree, does he not think it is a hardship on that poor little man in Mississippi to put a tax on his automobile, on his radio, on his right to go to the theater, and on every little thing that he may have, outside of the clothes he wears and the grub he eats that comes off the farm?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; the Senator from Mississippi dislikes to tax his people; but the people of Mississippi are brave. They are patriotic, and they are willing to subscribe their little sums in this emergency to take care of the great national catastrophe. I believe that the people of Louisiana, whom I know well, and among whom I have lived as a student at their State university, do not begrudge in times like these coughing up a little amount to balance the Budget. It is not the first time they have paid taxes on automobiles and admissions. They did so through the war and up until 1926. There is an admissions tax now on theater tickets of more than $3. The tax on automobiles that we propose now is not as high as it was in 1924. It is not as high as it was in 1921 and 1922. Democratic Secretaries of the Treasury have recommended, time after time, that a way to raise a part of the taxes necessary to run the Government was by imposing these nuisance taxes on jewelry, on cosmetics, on admissions, on sporting goods, automobiles, and various things like that. There has been no partisanship in that; but here is what happened in the committee and prompted them:

The Secretary of the Treasury recommended to the Ways and Means Committee normal taxes of 2, 4, and 6 per cent, as I recall. He recommended that the highest bracket should be 40 per cent. In other words, he wanted to go back to the 1924 tax law. The Ways and Means Committee did not accept that recommendation entirely. They raised the normal taxes a little bit, but they did not go higher on the surtaxes.

When the bill came before the Finance Committee of the Senate, did we show any particular favoritism to the wealth of the country? No, Mr. President. Wealth gets nothing particularly out of this bill. You who want to smite the rich of the country, and think that as a result of it industry is going to start up, labor is going to be employed, remember that in this bill we have done this. Let me cite to you four things that have been done in this bill that hit the wealthy people of the country as they have never been hit before.

One is the estate tax. Where before they had $100,000 exemption, and in the highest bracket the tax was 20 per cent, this bill graduates the estate tax up to 45 per cent, and lowers the exemption to $50,000. That is what the fellow who accumulates something and dies is going to have to pay. He is going to have to cough up pretty well, and there are some States in this country that have inheritance and estate taxes also. So he is going to be hit again.

The present law imposes normal tax rates of 1½ per cent, 3 per cent, and 5 per cent, and in the highest bracket only 20 per cent. Our committee have recommended not what the House recommended, but we say that in the first bracket there shall be a 3 per cent normal tax imposed; we say that in the next bracket there shall be a 6 per cent normal tax imposed; and we say that in the last bracket—which goes all the way through, and the man who has to pay tremendous surtaxes in the higher brackets must pay that as well—the normal tax shall be 9 per cent. So our rates are 3, 6, and 9. The rates of the present law are 1½, 3, and 5. The House rates are 2, 4, and 7. Have we shown any favoritism in that matter? On corporations we have increased the tax from 12 per cent in the present law to 14 per cent, as recommended by the committee. These taxes were written following conferences among the minority members of the committee. We have not tried to put anything over. We knew that there was a sentiment that perhaps we ought to go above $100,000 in surtaxes; so we did not stop, as the House stopped, at 40 per cent. I offered as an amendment a new schedule; and in this bill we not only carry this increase of the normal taxes to 3, 6, and 9 per cent, but we raised the surtax in the higher brackets to 45 per cent, and stopped only at $1,000,000. That was done at the suggestion of my good friend from Montana [Mr. WALSH] in a speech that he made—not the amount, I may say, but the suggestion that we ought not to stop just at $100,000—and I agreed with him on the floor one day that it ought not to stop there. We went to 45 per cent.

What does a man to-day have to pay under the Senate committee bill in the highest brackets? He has to pay the 9 per cent normal tax, and he has to pay 45 per cent surtax. In other words, he has to pay 54 per cent in the highest bracket; and yet that is not satisfactory to some people. Some other folks think they ought to have their way. A 55 per cent surtax and a 65 per cent surtax would be more pleasing to them. It was the opinion of a majority of the Finance Committee, however, and certainly the opinion of a majority of the Democratic members of that committee, that this was a very fair proposition, and that when we went to 54 per cent in the highest bracket we were doing pretty well in taking that amount from a man.

Do you know that there are some States in this country that charge as high as 15 per cent income taxes now upon their citizens? So they have to bear heavy taxation both as to State and as to Nation.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator recall what the rates were when the Secretary of the Treasury came before the committee? What were the rates that the committee had agreed to before Mills wrote the bill?

Mr. HARRISON. Before Mr. Mills wrote the bill?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad the Senator has designated the author of the bill. The bill when it came from the House was, as I stated——

Mr. COUZENS. No; I am asking the Senator to state what the bill was when Mills appeared before the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand. Of course, the Senator knows all about this; but I am stating that when the bill came from the House the normal rates were 2, 4, and 7 per cent, and we were considering that proposition, and we had adopted 3, 6, and 9 when Mr. Mills came before the committee, and then there was a feeling that the rates ought to be changed back to 4 and 8. I think somebody made that motion, and that may have been adopted for the time being; but under the pressure of the Senator from Massachusetts and myself and some others we shifted the rates back to 3, 6, and 9. Am I stating the facts?

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator is not exactly stating the facts.

Mr. HARRISON. Wherein did I not state the facts?

Mr. COUZENS. I think the Senator is overlooking something.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not overlooked much in that committee.

Mr. COUZENS. I know the Senator did not intend to mislead; but the rates were 4 and 8 per cent. They were reduced from 3, 6, and 9 to 4 and 8 per cent at the urgent request of Mr. Mills. Then——

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is stating exactly what I said.

Mr. COUZENS. But just a minute. When Mr. Mills came before the committee he urged an entirely new schedule; and the committee adopted the schedule of 4 and 8 per cent, increasing the lower brackets from 3 to 4 and reducing the higher brackets from 9 to 8.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator thinks he has stated anything differently from the way I stated it, he can have his own opinion. I stated exactly that. If the Senator wants to emphasize that fact, he can state it over again.

Mr. COUZENS. No; but I want the Senator to say this——

Mr. HARRISON. I say the Senator has stated absolutely the facts.

Mr. COUZENS. I had not finished the facts.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I will not agree with the Senator yet.

Mr. COUZENS. The committee voted to accept the Mills proposal from A to Z, which was 4 and 8 per cent, and the Senator from Massachusetts will recall that I got up in committee and protested against the committee adding 1 per cent to the lower brackets and taking 1 per cent off the higher brackets, and the Senator from Massachusetts got up and supported that position, and the committee reversed itself.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to give to the Senator whatever glory there may be in that one act.

Mr. COUZENS. No; I am giving the glory to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator now is going to take away all of that glory by attempting to put on the man in the lower brackets 6 and 12 per cent normal taxes.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GLENN. I am wondering whether the Senator from Mississippi has covered the provision about the tax upon personal services.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. I had not finished.

Mr. GLENN. I did not want to interrupt, but I wish the Senator would refer to that.

Mr. HARRISON. I will. So we went to these normal tax rates of 3, 6, and 9 per cent, and surtaxes of 45 per cent, and 54 per cent in the highest brackets, thinking that perhaps that would satisfy the Senate and we might get together upon it. It was a compromise proposition.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. In connection with the question which the Senator from Michigan propounded, I think there is some error even in his statement. When Mr. Mills came up to the meeting of the committee the rates had been fixed at 4 and 8 per cent under my amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; that is true.

Mr. CONNALLY. The pending amendment was 4 and 8 per cent, but the 9 per cent was taken care of by the fact that we had increased the surtax. So it was immaterial whether we put the normal rate at 9 per cent all the way through or not, because we took care of that.

Mr. COUZENS. That is entirely correct. That was done just before Mills came up.

Mr. CONNALLY. That was voted one afternoon and Mr. Mills came up the following morning.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; that is correct; and the Senator's amendment went all the way up to 55 per cent.

Mr. CONNALLY. Fifty-five per cent.

Mr. COUZENS. And it began with a normal tax of 4 and 8 per cent.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. There is not any question as to that. All of us are in agreement on that. After we had finished and some Senators on the committee had voted against this excise tax and that excise tax, we found at the last that $77,000,000 more was needed to balance the Budget; and then, and only then, was it that the Senator from Texas offered the proposition to change what we had already done and passed in the committee, making the normal rates 4 and 8 per cent, and the highest surtax, I believe, 55 per cent. So when Mr. Mills came and we got into tremendous confusion, it looked as if everything was wrong. So it is Mr. Mills's plan. I am willing to give him all the credit for it.

Mr. COUZENS. So am I.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; nobody wants to be the daddy of this proposition or any other like proposition. [Laughter.] But most of the things that Mr. Mills had recommended originally, either to the Ways and Means Committee of the House or even to the Finance Committee of the Senate, had been adopted by the Finance Committee. We had adopted his check proposition and his admissions proposition, except that we had limited the admissions tax to 45 cents, and in his recommendations he suggested starting at 10 cents.

So most of the propositions recommended had been accepted by the committee. The main difference of opinion between Mr. Mills's original recommendation and the House and the Finance Committee was respecting income taxes and surtaxes. He had recommended the 1924 rates on normal income taxes, namely, 2, 4, and 6 per cent. He had recommended only a slight change in the estate tax; and they had put on in the House a surtax of 45 per cent in the higher brackets and they had lowered the exemption to $5,000. Those were the two main propositions. Of course, when I say "the estate tax" I include the gift tax, which the House had also put in in order to buttress the collection of the estate tax.

So when Mr. Mills came before the committee with his compromise plan which had balanced the Budget, it carried with it the suggestion I have just stated, not disturbing the estate tax, in which we were very much interested, and not disturbing the surtax, which the House had refused to accept in toto.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I know the Senator does not want to do the Secretary of the Treasury any injustice. He will recall, however, that the Secretary did insist earlier on reducing the estate tax. He protested the House rates on estate taxes.

Mr. HARRISON. There is no doubt of that. I said he never did recommend to the Ways and Means Committee the estate tax as it was adopted over there. So, with those exceptions, there was not a great difference.

We can go ahead and act on the Couzens amendment, and if that is defeated go ahead and adopt some other amendment which might be offered. But the members of the Committee on Finance feel they have done pretty well by this bill. We have given it our best attention, and with what meager ability we have we have tried to bring in a good bill.

I wish so much that the Senate, in the interest of stabilizing conditions in the country, in the interest of restoring some confidence, in the interest of the fiscal stability and soundness of our Government could accept the recommendations of the Committee on Finance. Let us vote these higher estate taxes as the committee has written them. Let us vote the higher surtaxes and normal taxes as recommended by the Finance Committee. Let us vote the administrative features, which give to the business man no particular encouragement because we have stricken from the bill or restricted the net loss and gain provisions. Citizens can not again come and against some net profits set off some net losses, as they have been doing heretofore. We have limited such action to losses for one year, and we have limited the losses which can be figured on security transactions to security gains which have been made in the past. Those things are not what the man who has a lot of money wants.

If this amendment is adopted, of course it will be great encouragement to those who are unwilling to participate in the great industrial development of this country and risk their money in productive enterprise, which would give employment to thousands and millions of people and start the wheels of progress going. There is not a man who owns a tax-exempt security or bond who will not feel he is worth more upon the enactment of a law that would take 77 cents out of every dollar one might receive.

The country is in no condition to accept such a thing as that, and we would impede progress, we would destroy the hopes of the people, we would do more harm a thousand times if we passed a bill with the idea of smiting wealth than we would dream could be done. We are all here trying to put the country back upon its feet.

I hope that Senators on this side of the aisle who have any confidence in the minority members of the Finance Committee will at least give us some encouragement in the difficult task that has been put upon us, and not, in the consideration of this bill, wipe this or that provision out, which would mean a thirty or forty million dollar deficit, and then call for us to write a new bill upon the floor of the Senate. Whatever minor changes should be made can be taken care of in the conference between the two Houses.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think it is only fair to say that the pending tax bill does not completely satisfy any member of the Finance Committee, and Mr. Mills made it equally clear that it was not satisfactory to him. It represents a compromise of conflicting views.

There was no particular school that had a majority in the Finance Committee. I know that was true of the Republican members. Some of them were in complete and hopeless disagreement with their brethren on that side of the table. That also seemed to be so on the Democratic side.

As a result, the committee found itself doing things, bringing about results, which bade fair to be as unwise as was the bill made up on the floor of the House of Representatives. From the way the Finance Committee was heading it seemed probable that the output of the committee would be just as disheartening to the country as was the bill that was passed by the House. At that juncture the Secretary of the Treasury came before the committee and suggested a compromise, satisfactory to nobody—which is almost the definition of a compromise, I think—but a compromise bill which embodied many of the things which the Finance Committee had put in and many of the features of the House bill, and yet one which would balance the Budget.

I suppose there was nobody on the Finance Committee who had a more bitter pill to swallow than myself, because, for reasons which I will explain in a moment, I had been urging a sales tax with all the vigor that was in me. The chairman of the committee, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], had been urging a sales tax since long before I came to the Senate, as were some of the others of us who sincerely believe that that is the only sound method of raising Government revenue. But I will not argue that proposition at this moment.

What I say is that we had to swallow that bitter pill, we had to give up that theory, in which we believed, for the sake of averting what seemed to be almost chaos. It is all well and good to call this the Mills bill, if one wants to do that. It is a recognition of Mr. Mills's earnest effort to swallow his own convictions, and bring some kind of order out of chaos. But it is only fair to him and to the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Mississippi to acknowledge that no man is the parent of this tax bill. It is born of necessity. It has as many injustices eliminated from it as we were able, in the compromise, to eliminate. That is what the bill is.

If once we begin to tear that compromise to pieces, heaven knows what the result will be. If we should adopt the pending amendment, then the next thing would be that the automobile industry would be here urging that the special sales tax which was put on it be stricken out of the bill, and that would create a deficiency in the revenue. Then would come the entertainment people, and they would want the admissions tax stricken out. Then the telegraph and telephone companies, and one after the other of the special interests which have been taxed would come in and ask for relief, and the mangled body of the tax bill would not be recognizable by anybody. If once we begin to whack away at this compromise, the tax bill will be ruined.

Now, just a word about the pending amendment. The amendment proposes, as I understand it, to increase the rates of normal taxes in the committee bill from 3 per cent on the first $4,000 of income to 6 per cent. It doubles the tax on the smallest income.

On the next $4,000 of income, under the committee bill the tax would be 6 per cent. Under the pending amendment half of that would be taxed at 6 and the last half at 12 per cent.

The committee would tax the third $4,000 at 9 per cent. The pending amendment would tax it at 12 per cent.

The committee allows an exemption, as I recall it, of $1,000 on the unmarried man and $2,500 on the married man. This amendment, as I understand it, would leave the $1,000 on the unmarried man, as in the committee bill, but would reduce the exemption allowed to a married man from $2,500, as in the committee bill, to $2,000, as in the war-time legislation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, does it not also provide that the exemption on account of minors under 18 years of age shall be reduced from $400 to $200?

Mr. REED. Yes; I was coming to that. The next thing is that, in accordance with the several tax laws enacted in recent years, the committee has continued a $400 exemption for each dependent, in addition to the $2,500 allowed a married man. In other words, a man with three dependent children and a wife would be allowed an exemption of $2,500 to begin with, and an exemption of $1,200 more for his family. He would begin to pay a normal tax only when his income exceeded $3,700 a year. The same man, under the pending Couzens amendment, would begin to pay a tax when his income exceeded $2,600 a year, as against $3,700 under the committee bill. So it will be seen that the amendment would not only double his tax but would apply that doubled tax to $1,100 of the income of that particular taxpayer, which, under the committee bill, would go tax exempt.

I think that when the country as a whole realized that the committee was doing that to the very lowest income group of taxpayers, the country would resent it very bitterly. We not only would double their tax, as I have said, but would tax, under the amendment, $1,100 of income which, under the committee bill, would go tax free.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is it correct to say that the lowest normal tax under the amendment of the Senator from Michigan would be the equivalent of the highest normal tax under the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; as I recall it, the highest tax under the bill as it passed the House was 7 per cent.

Mr. HARRISON. Under the bill as it was reported from the Ways and Means Committee they were the same.

Mr. REED. Yes; until Mr. LAGUARDIA went to work on it.

Mr. HARRISON. The lowest normal tax under the Couzens amendment is equivalent to the highest under the bill as it came from the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The lowest normal tax under the pending amendment is 6 per cent?

Mr. REED. That is right.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And under the bill as it passed the House it was 2 per cent?

Mr. REED. Yes; 2, 4, and 6.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The pending amendment multiplies by three the rate on the little fellow.

Mr. REED. That is correct. At the present time the same man I speak of is taxed 1½ per cent normal tax on his first $4,000 of income, and he is allowed an exemption of $3,500 to begin with, and $400 for each child.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What would he be taxed under the so-called Couzens amendment?

Mr. REED. It would depend upon the size of his income, naturally; but the Couzens amendment would start after he got $2,000, and would give him an allowance of $200 for each child, and then would start to tax him at 6 per cent, which is four times the tax he is paying to-day, with a much larger exemption than would be allowed under the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the fact that a person with a $3,000 income, under the pending amendment, would pay a tax of $60. Under the Finance Committee original proposal it was $4. It would be about fifteen times as much under the Couzens amendment. If he had an income of $5,000, the tax under the Couzens amendment would be $180, and under the Finance Committee original proposal would be $56. In those brackets is where the greatest number of taxpayers are to be found, and there is where a great part of the revenue will be derived if the proposal of the Senator from Michigan is agreed to and the tax rates of 1918 are again put into effect.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I inquired of the Senator the other day whether he could furnish us with figures showing the amount which would be realized from each of the brackets. It would be exceedingly interesting if we could have the same information on the proposal of the Senator from Michigan. Reference is now made to the fact that there would be a very large number of taxpayers in those lower brackets. It would be interesting to us to know how much the "little fellows," as it has been expressed, will pay and how much the "big fellows" will pay.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. I want to draw the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact that at page 10186 of the RECORD of May 14 he will find a complete table showing the amount of revenue to be expected from all the various groups, which, of course, shows that the largest amount of revenue, some $175,000,000, will be collected from those who have incomes of $10,000 to $25,000 a year.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In view of what has been said about Secretary Mills's connection with the matter, I think it ought to appear of record that the recommendations of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and his recommendations up to the last day upon which the committee acted were normal rates of 2, 4, and 6 per cent, and that he never changed his position until the Finance Committee raised those normal rates above 2, 4, and 6.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. I think it is only just to Secretary Mills that we should make note of that fact.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. With pleasure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Michigan whether there is in the RECORD or whether there is available a comparison of the taxes that will be paid under the present law, under the Finance Committee bill, and under the Couzens amendment?

May I add to that question this statement: The Washington Post on a recent date published a brief comparison relating to the present law and the Finance Committee bill. It shows, for instance, that on a net income of $2,000 the present law levies a tribute of $5.63, whereas the Finance Committee bill would levy $22.50. The comparison is extended up to incomes reaching $1,000,000. What I am anxious to know now is whether there is available an extension of that comparison so as to show the amount of taxes that would be paid under the Couzens amendment.

Mr. REED. Yes; the Senator from Arkansas will find that at page 10186 of the RECORD, in Table No. 1. That takes typical incomes from $100,000 up to $1,000,000, and it is evidently calculated on the basis of a married man with no dependents.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I introduced the same table in the RECORD, and it appears in the RECORD of May 13.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I thank the Senator. That is the information I desired.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we have been talking about the married man with two or three children and a moderate income, the man with $3,000, $4,000, or $5,000 income. The reason why I picked him to talk about first is that his case is somewhat simpler and his number is infinitely greater than that of the big taxpayer.

But let us see what else the amendment of the Senator from Michigan would do. It would increase the tax on earnings of corporations from the present rate of 12 per cent to 18 per cent. The Finance Committee bill fixes that tax at 14 per cent, which, in my judgment, is much too high. Remember, Mr. President, that is not necessarily a tax on big men or rich men. When we see into how many different stockholdings the capital of any big corporation has been divided, when we read that the average holding of the Pennsylvania Railroad is something less than 60 shares, that the average holding of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., or of United States Steel is much less than that, we realize, as we never did before, that most of our corporations in America are owned by thrifty people who have a few shares, and not by rich men who have thousands of shares. When we start by putting 12 or 14 or 18 per cent tax on the net earnings of corporations, we are taking money that belongs to human beings who for the most part are not rich, are not wealthy, are not in the surtax class, but who may be the holders of 2 or 3 shares, who may be the holders of 10 shares, which represent the savings of a lifetime.

And yet, because that thing in which they have their money invested is called a corporation, we propose to slap on a surtax of 18 per cent right at the beginning, if we adopt the Couzens amendment, or 14 per cent if we approve the committee proposal. Then when the money reaches the stockholder we tax it again with normal tax, and with surtax if he has enough income to get into the surtax bracket. That begins at $6,000 under the terms of the Finance Committee bill. The surtax begins to bite long before we get to the rich man.

Then what else does the amendment of the Senator from Michigan propose to do? Coupled with it will be also the provision of the Finance Committee bill limiting the right to deduct stock losses. A doctor may make $25,000 if his practice is good, and he may be unwise, and most doctors are, in matters of investment. They are almost as unwise as we lawyers are. The doctor may lose his $25,000 in December after he saved it up through the year. I do not think I am instancing an uncommon case. Under the tax bill as it stands we would tax the doctor on the $25,000 that he earned and then we would say to him, "Your money may be all gone in your business venture in the stock market, but you can not deduct it from income. You may wind up the year absolutely without a red cent, but we are going to tax you on your income and refuse to consider your losses in stocks."

The Senator from Michigan estimates that that change in the law, coupled with the high rates in his amendment, will give us $204,000,000 of additional revenue, taken from the people who have had actual losses of income on which we are impressing the tax. That $204,000,000 comes out of grief if any tax ever did, because all of it comes from people who have lost the income on which we are asking them to pay the tax. They have lost it in a perfectly legitimate business venture, and yet we still ask them to pay a part of it as if they still had it.

Further, there are administrative changes which will result in a larger income when interpreted through this schedule of rates. The estimate of the Senator from Michigan, I understand, is that for the fiscal year 1933, which is a half year's collection on account of the increased rates, there will be an additional amount of about $690,000,000 to be gathered. I have taken that up with the Treasury to see whether their figures agreed. Their answer is that they think the estimate of the Senator from Michigan is a little high. The Treasury estimates about $463,000,000 of additional revenue in the last six months of the fiscal year 1933 and about $800,000,000 additional revenue in each fiscal year thereafter. The people who are paying that income tax this year are paying about $300,000,000 into the Federal Government. This proposal, according to the estimate of the Senator from Michigan, will increase the tax of those individuals about 400 per cent and according to the Treasury estimate about 267 per cent. It seems to me that it is so essentially unfair that the mere statement of the amount of that increase on this limited group of American citizens ought to be sufficient to defeat the amendment.

Let us see what else it is going to do. We talk about "soaking the rich," and we talk about putting the high surtaxes on the rich man. But that is not what we are doing in this proposal of the Senator from Michigan. It is not the rich man who is going to pay these extortionate taxes—it is the man who is trying to get rich. It is the aggressive man who embarks in a business venture to get rich. The rich man has harbors of safety. He does not need to pay these taxes. There are estimated to be over $20,000,000,000 of tax-exempt bonds outstanding at this minute in this country. The rich man who has won his stake and has his capital garnered in can invest in those bonds, and we know that he does it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the Senator from Pennsylvania know, as a matter of history and as a matter of fact, that the very rich have very few investments in tax-exempt bonds, relatively speaking? It was illustrated the other day in the debate, according to the figures.

Mr. REED. If it was demonstrated that way, it was demonstrated wrong.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. I put it in the RECORD. I have a list which I got from the Treasury Department, from the Senator's own friend, showing 285 estates with returns of over $3,000,000 and an aggregate of $2,700,000,000 of assets, and only $300,000,000 of tax exempts. I will put the complete statement in the RECORD if the Senator questions the statement.

Mr. REED. I do not doubt the Senator could pick out big estates in which there were comparatively few tax exempts, but I am talking about instances like that of William Rockefeller. If I remember correctly, the figures of his estate, 90 per cent of all he had in the world, was invested in tax-free bonds.

Mr. COUZENS. There was one estate, I believe, Mr. Whitney's or Mr. Ryan's, which had a value of $135,000,000 in assets, and not a dollar in tax exempts.

Mr. REED. That may be. The Senator is more of an authority on that matter than I am.

Mr. COUZENS. I got the record from the Treasury, and the Senator certainly will not question its accuracy.

Mr. REED. One can pick out certain estates to sustain such a point as that. I say there are approximately $23,000,000,000 of tax-exempt bonds outstanding in America at this time. Somebody owns them. They are not owned by life-insurance companies or by banks.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was interested in the statement made by the Senator a moment ago that the proposal offered by the Senator from Michigan is not to tax the rich but to tax the man who is trying to get rich.

Mr. REED. That is right.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can understand very readily that the man who has an income, we will say, of $35,000 a year might not be regarded as a very rich man.

Mr. REED. He might even be insolvent, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but this proposes to tax a man who has an income of $500,000, for instance—I say, "an income."

Mr. REED. Exactly; an income.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. A net income of $500,000.

Mr. REED. Precisely.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And the Senator thinks that such a man is one who is trying to get rich?

Mr. REED. Precisely.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He is not rich but is trying to get rich?

Mr. REED. Precisely. The Senator's remark illustrates admirably the error that has marked the consideration of revenue bills of this kind in both Houses of Congress ever since we began to levy an income tax. The Senator says that a man with a net income of $500,000 is rich. The Senator evidently assumes that that income is from investments which that man has and that his principal must be many times the amount of his income.

Mr. President, as often as not that so-called income may represent the profit of years of activity; it may represent the accumulated fees for years of endeavor that went before. We all know of cases of lawyers who, after trying a case for years, get their fee in a lump sum, but the income taxes on it are paid during the year when it was received. We saw the Woolworth Building erected and its architect get paid a large fee in the high-tax year, I think it was, of 1919, when the United States Government took from him some sixty-odd per cent of the profits of his work.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am curious to know from the Senator about how much income would a man have to have in order to be rich in his estimation?

Mr. REED. I think a man with $500,000 a year regular income is a very rich man; there is no difference between us on that point; but I am trying to tell the Senate, if it will permit me to do so, some of the asylums into which the kind of rich man the Senator has in mind can go.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GLENN. I do not wish to interrupt, but the question I should like to ask is pertinent to this discussion. The Senator referred to a fee earned by the architect of the Woolworth Building covering perhaps several years' work.

Mr. REED. Yes; I referred to Mr. Cass Gilbert.

Mr. GLENN. Under this bill what percentage would be taken from him?

Mr. REED. I do not remember the exact amount.

Mr. GLENN. There is a provision in the bill with which I am not familiar, and I should like to ask a question about it. On page 16 it is provided that—

> (e) There shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the amount by which the compensation (including salaries, commissions, emoluments, and rewards) of any individual for personal services exceeds compensation at the rate of $75,000 per year, a tax of 80 per cent of such amount. The tax imposed by this subsection shall be in lieu of all other taxes under this title in respect of such amount.

Referring to the income of an architect or a lawyer or other professional man, does that mean that an architect, for instance, would be assessed 80 per cent of his compensation in excess of $75,000?

Mr. REED. Exactly. That was a last-moment inspiration put in the bill; it is not a part of Mr. Mills's compromise; and that provision would apply to architects' fees.

Mr. GLENN. I understand that the provision would apply to the case to which the Senator referred?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEBERT in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I simply want to remark in this connection, if the Senator will permit me, that the instances in which men spring suddenly from nothing to an income of $200,000 or $500,000 or a million dollars are so rare as to be properly disregarded in legislating. Mr. Cass Gilbert, for instance, has been a distinguished architect since I was a very young man. I have visited him in his office; he maintains elaborate and expensive offices in the city of New York. He has constructed works all over the country. As long ago as 1890 he was consulted concerning some public works in my State then under construction. He had, beyond any question in the world, a very large regular income before he ever became employed as architect on the construction of the Woolworth Building.

Moreover, it is the same way with lawyers. There is no lawyer who earns a fee of $100,000 or $500,000 in extraordinary cases except after he has established a reputation by years and years of experience, and each succeeding year his income usually increases to some extent. So the instances, I take it, of a man suddenly making a turn and receiving $100,000 or $500,000 in income are so rare that they may be disregarded in legislating.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield further to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GLENN. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question, and I do so merely for information. Does the Senator from Montana think there should be a discrimination as against an architect or a lawyer?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly not.

Mr. GLENN. As compared with a man who has a similar income or an income of a similar amount derived from investments; should a professional man be discriminated against by taxes at the highest rate?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is a provision, of course, in our revenue acts which allows a deduction from the regular rate for earned income.

Mr. GLENN. But the bill seems to do the other thing.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I understand the earned income provisions are preserved.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I may yield to myself for a moment, I will say that the deduction for earned income has been reduced in this bill from the present $30,000 to the level of $12,000.

I am perfectly well aware that what I have been trying to say for the last 30 minutes has not made sense, because I have been interrupted so often that it has not made sense even to me. What I am trying to say is that in considering this tax bill, and in considering its predecessor tax bills, we have all along gone on the theory that what we were taxing was a regular income that kept coming in, regardless of the effort of the taxpayer. In all our debate about the high surtaxes we have talked about the rich man's income. What I am now trying to say is that the rich man has these asylums of safety to which he can go and not pay any taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. And he does go there.

Mr. REED. He does go there. And when $20,000,000,000 of tax-free securities are outstanding in America, I venture to say, whether statistics show it or not, that a very large part of them are in the hands of the rich men of the country.

I pointed out in the committee another asylum that is very much resorted to in recent years; it was not resorted to so much in the earlier years of the last decade, but in the last few years it has been very greatly resorted to. I refer to the purchase of annuities. Any rich man, not the professional man, not the Caruso, who gets his income by hard work, but the rich man whom we are trying to soak here, can go to any insurance company and buy an annuity which is absolutely tax-free to him until such time as his annuity payments have been accumulated to an amount in excess of what he paid for it in capital payments. That is to say, if some one at the age of 60 puts $1,000,000 into the Equitable Life Insurance Co. in the purchase of an annuity he can get about 10 per cent on his money for the next 10 years absolutely tax-free. It is only after those annuity payments have amounted to more than $1,000,000 that he begins to pay any income tax at all on that body of wealth. There have been hundreds of millions of those annuities bought in recent years. The business in them, I was told, is thriving mightily, I think at this minute, because of the menace of these high tax rates.

The Senator from Montana says that earned incomes of large amount are uncommon. I say that every fortune in America and every fortune in the world had its origin in just such earned income. It had to have, for only work creates value. If we should adopt the schedule of surtax rates as proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, we will take the heart out of every man of initiative and ability in America. He will point to Mr. Rockefeller and say, "Oh, yes; you let him earn his pile tax free, but you have put the Government in partnership with me and take three-fourths of all I make. If I go to work and build up a business, or if I sing like a Caruso, or if I plan buildings as can Cass Gilbert, or if I am such a doctor as is Doctor Mayo, you will take 75 per cent of the proceeds of my earnings."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. The Senator has been interrupted so much I hesitate to interrupt him again. However, I am sure from the Senator's wide experience that, as a matter of fact, he has learned that insurance is not a sound investment except for the feature of protection. Anyone will advise you that insurance is not a good investment.

Mr. REED. No; I do not agree with that at all.

Mr. LONG. That is my understanding, based upon knowledge obtained from pretty well proven insurance men in this country.

Now, as to the tax-exempt securities, let me ask the Senator at what price during our prosperous times the United States Steel bonds, say, 5's or 6's, were selling for on the exchanges?

Mr. REED. The United States Steel Corporation has no bonds outstanding.

Mr. LONG. Then, take, for instance, the Pennsylvania Railroad. They have a bond issue—6's, I believe.

Mr. REED. They have bond issues carrying various percentages of interest, 4¼'s, 5's, and so forth.

Mr. LONG. It is my recollection that at the time its stock was considered very good, the bonds of the Pennsylvania Railroad, its 6's, were selling somewhere around par.

Mr. REED. In ordinary times the 6 per cent bonds of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. would sell away above par.

Mr. LONG. The 5's, for instance.

Mr. REED. The last issue the Pennsylvania Railroad sold carried 4¼ per cent; but what has that got to do with it?

Mr. LONG. The point I am endeavoring to make is that the bonds of the Government, which were tax exempt, were selling away above par, although carrying 3½ per cent interest. In other words, municipal securities, public securities, that are tax exempt are in reality taxed because the holders receive far less income return from them than they receive from private securities which they buy.

Taking the State of Louisiana as an example—and I think it is a fair example—at the time it sold its bonds for 4½ per cent, private bonds which were probably just as good as any on the market were being sold carrying around 6 per cent interest. So if the securities issued by States or municipalities had not been tax exempt, money would have been taken from the States or municipalities. It would not have been taken from the man buying the tax-exempt securities.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator really mean that he thinks that the difference in the interest yield of a tax-exempt bond and the bond of a private enterprise represents the difference to the big taxpayer in the yield on the two classes of investments?

Mr. LONG. As an average proposition I would say that it would—easily.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, take a man whose income falls in the highest bracket under the Couzens amendment; the tax on him is 77 per cent. He would have to get a full taxable bond paying about 16¼ per cent to equal in net income the yield of a tax-free 4 per cent bond. Does not the Senator see how that works?

Mr. LONG. I see that; but how many securities would he have to own to do that? He would have to own several million dollars of tax-exempt securities.

Mr. REED. He would have to be a rich man.

Mr. LONG. And at his demise his estate would then naturally be subject to the inheritance tax.

Mr. REED. Of course.

Mr. LONG. So, if he had dodged the tax for so many years, he would be caught by the inheritance tax or the gift tax.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; because, in any event, whether he dodged his taxes during his life or not, his estate has to pay when he dies; but during his life he is going to make his investments, safety being considered, in such a manner as will insure the largest amount remaining in his pocket after paying his taxes, and he has either got to get a totally tax-free bond paying 4 per cent or a totally taxable bond paying about 16¼ per cent in order to have the same amount left in his pocket after the United States has taken its cut out of the proceeds.

Mr. LONG. That may be true; I have not figured it out, and the Senator has; but does not the Senator think that nothing could be better than to make municipal securities attractive to purchasers?

Mr. REED. Oh, I have no doubt about that. The adoption of the Couzens amendment will send up the price of municipal bonds; there is no doubt about that. If it is a "market-rigging" project, if it is desired to boost municipals on the market, it is admirably calculated to do so. Correspondingly, it is going to give a sinking spell to all the taxable securities.

Mr. LONG. I know; but the point I make is, not only will it do that, which the Senator very graciously concedes, but does he not think that nothing could do more to reestablish the States and the municipalities and to make their credits marketable?

Mr. REED. Of course I want to see their credit kept good; yes; but not at the expense of all American industry in this fashion.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. I want to ask the Senator if the economic law of diminishing returns operates in fixing the rates of income taxes. I mean, is there a point at which the rate may be fixed where you will receive the most taxes; and if you go above that particular rate, the returns will diminish; and if you go below it, of course, the returns will diminish?

Mr. REED. The Senator is undoubtedly right. We have been groping for the point of maximum returns for a long time. I feel, and I believe most of the members of the committee feel, that even the rates we have put in the Finance Committee bill go too high to receive the maximum returns. We are entering the field of diminishing returns when we go even as high as the Finance Committee has gone.

Mr. LOGAN. Is it not probable that if the rates in the bill that has been reported were less we would receive more money in taxes than we will receive under those rates?

Mr. REED. Not more money for the next year or two, but in the long run more money; yes.

Mr. LOGAN. I am talking about the long run, not about temporary matters.

Mr. REED. As a temporary expedient for raising more revenue, I think the Couzens amendment would be effective. It would, in nearby years, drag into the Treasury a larger amount than the Finance Committee bill; but in the long run it would have such a deadening effect on American business, it would be so discouraging to enterprise, that I am convinced that not only would it defeat its own purpose of raising the maximum amount of money, but it would do the maximum amount of evil to American business.

Mr. LOGAN. I wondered whether there had been any data assembled about the point at which the rate could be fixed so as to produce the most revenue. If any data have been assembled on that question I should like to know where I can get them.

Mr. REED. I do not believe that anyone has ever reached a satisfactory conclusion as to that. As I say, we have been groping for it. The Finance Committee has had it in mind. We have been astonished to find, sometimes, that the reductions we have made, as in 1924, have actually brought in higher revenues than the old rates before they were reduced; but we can not tell that that is due solely to the reduction in rate, because it accompanies an increase in business activity, and no man can say how the reduction of the rate contributed to that result.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me say to the Senator that I have had some experience along that line in my own State. By reducing the rate on intangible property from an average of about $1.30 on $100 of value to 40 cents on $100 of value we actually increased the income in taxes fivefold when there was no change in the amount of property in the State, because the people assessed their property and made honest returns and paid taxes on it without seeking to evade payment; and as the rate went up people evaded the tax, just as they will all over America.

Mr. REED. The Senator has explained the process just as it has occurred and always will occur, and that is what will occur under the Couzens amendment. All the ingenuity of the tax sharps of the United States will be directed toward evasion.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. May I say that I have made some little inquiry, and my information is that we would derive perhaps $10,000,000 or less in the higher brackets—that is, between 45 and 65 per cent. I am not speaking now of the normal tax; but assuming a continuity, a regularity of the normal tax, and increasing the surtax from 45 to 65 per cent, we would only get, by reason of that, about $10,000,000. In doing that, however, we are imposing upon the smaller taxpayer, the man in the bracket from $6,000 up to $20,000 or $25,000, by far the larger part of this increase. Perhaps $140,000,000 to $200,000,000 of the increase does not come from the rich. Ten millions comes from the rich, but from $140,000,000 to $200,000,000 comes from those in the lower brackets.

Mr. REED. I think that is undoubtedly true. All I am pleading for, Mr. President, is that we shall bear in mind, at least for part of the time, that it is not the rich that we are reaching when we put on these high surtaxes. It is the men who are striving to lay by for themselves and their families a competence which can be invested and then yield income. In this country we have persistently declined to recognize that difference except to the very trivial extent of an allowance for earned income.

One thing in conclusion: I think our experience with the Government revenue this year has pointed out plainly for anybody who has an open mind that we make a mistake when we base our entire tax system on the net income of American taxpayers. We have a fluctuating base that falls off very quickly in times of depression like this. We have gone on legislating on the theory that incomes were permanent; that year by year we would have a solid, steady base upon which we could base our taxes; and this depression has proved that that is not so. We ought, in common sense, to combine with our system of income taxation some method based on something else than net income; and that is why I have in the past so strongly urged the sales tax. What the Finance Committee has done has been to reject the general sales tax and then impose a discriminatory, special, excessive sales tax on a number of businesses, picked more or less at haphazard. We have exempted the great run of American business from the tax, and we have put it all on a few businesses picked out for slaughter.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, it is not my business to run the affairs of the Senate, and I do not want to usurp the function of leadership on this side of the aisle; but it occurs to me that unless some limit is placed on debate this bill is never going to be enacted into law. The emergency is so great that, with all due respect to the leaders on both sides, I should like to submit the unanimous-consent agreement which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed agreement will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

That, commencing Tuesday, May 17, 1932, no Senator shall speak more than twice nor longer than 30 minutes on any provision or amendment thereto contained in the pending revenue bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in view of the absence of some Senators who are very conspicuously interested in the bill now pending, I object at the present time to the proposed agreement, and I also suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Davis	King	Shipstead
Bankhead	Dickinson	La Follette	Smith
Barbour	Dill	Logan	Smoot
Barkley	Fess	Long	Stephens
Blaine	Fletcher	McNary	Trammell
Bratton	Frazier	Metcalf	Tydings
Bulkley	Glenn	Morrison	Vandenberg
Byrns	Hale	Moses	Wagner
Capper	Harrison	Neely	Walcott
Caraway	Hawes	Norbeck	Walsh, Mass.
Carey	Hebert	Nye	Walsh, Mont.
Cohen	Howell	Patterson	Watson
Connally	Jones	Reed	White
Coolidge	Kean	Robinson, Ark.
Copeland	Kendrick	Schall
Couzens	Keyes	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a few moments ago, when the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] suggested a unanimous-consent agreement, I objected because of the absence of many Senators from the floor. Personally, I have no objection to the proposed agreement being restated by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unanimous-consent request will be restated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Maryland offers the following:

That commencing Tuesday, May 17, 1932, no Senator shall speak more than twice nor longer than 30 minutes on any provision or amendment thereto contained in the pending revenue bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I have given no little attention to agricultural statistics and have felt that I realized the situation of the farmer. However, a perusal of personal letters coming to my desk affords an intimate view of agricultural distress that is indeed revealing to me and should be available for the information of every Member of this body. Therefore I do not hesitate to call some of this correspondence to the attention of the Senate.

I hold in my hand two letters from conservative and substantial citizens in widely separated communities of my wonderfully fertile State, where, by the way, the use of artificial fertilizers is practically unknown, thus relieving the husbandman of an added expense so general in some sections of the Nation.

The first letter is from a man who has served his community in the State legislature a number of times during the past 20 years. He says in part:

I don't believe that you are fully aware of the feeling here in Nebraska at this particular time. The people seemed to have had hopes that we would have better conditions until about two weeks ago—practically everybody now seems to be discouraged and the feeling of unrest is getting stronger every day. Yesterday choice hogs were only $2.50 per hundred here, heavy hogs about $2; cattle getting cheaper every day, butterfat 12 cents, eggs 9 cents, and for what we buy the prices have not been reduced in comparison with the reduction of the prices on the products the farmer has to sell. Because people can not buy new implements the prices of repairs for machinery have advanced 25 per cent.

Because the people can not buy new agricultural implements the cost of repair parts has been increased 25 per cent.

Mortgages on farms are being foreclosed, and the banks in this country are refusing to loan money to the people to carry on their business and their farm obligations until a crop can be produced; and to make matters worse they are demanding payment of notes owed them, and in many cases it is taking stock from the farm that is needed to carry on work this summer, and can result in nothing but putting more people on the charity list than we now have.

This man lives in a small Nebraska town in the southern part of the State. He goes on to say:

The legislation enacted in Washington which helped the insurance companies, the railroads, and the banks has not reached the farming and laboring classes, and people are beginning to think that it is not going to. Can't something be done that will aid the farmer and the laboring man directly? By doing so I feel sure that it will bring about a betterment in conditions, and if we once get things moving upward I believe things will then take care of themselves. Everybody seems to have lost confidence. The feeling among the producing class is such that some plan must be devised to help them directly.

We have 200 families here that we have had to give help during the winter. We discontinued that help the first of this month, thinking that they would be able to get work; but it can not be found, and there is to be a public meeting here to-night to see what can be done to keep these people from starving.

I don't believe that Congress realizes the real condition that agriculture is in. I don't believe conditions around here are any different than anywhere else.

I feel it my duty to write you these facts and to impress upon you the need of some action on the subject before Congress adjourns.

Mr. President, I now read, in part, a letter from a banker situated in another section of the State:

As we are so close to agriculture, the writer owning 980 acres, and having farmers principally for customers of the bank, we believe we appreciate the seriousness of the situation. Our perspective is limited, but we do know conditions here.

You are undoubtedly familiar with conditions generally, but would like to call your attention to a very common condition prevailing in this locality. Let us take as an example a man operating a 160-acre farm, planted to the following crops:

60 acres corn, yielding 28 bushels per acre; at market, 20 cents		$336
60 acres wheat, yielding 18 bushels per acre; at market, 40 cents		432
35 acres oats, yielding 25 bushels per acre; at market, 20 cents		175
5 acres road and yards, without income		-----
Total income		943
Expenses:
Taxes	$150
Insurance, repairs, and depreciation; over	100
Interest on $10,000 mortgage, at 5½ per cent	550
Total expenses		800
Balance for year's labor and interest on his investment		143

An impossible amount on which to support a family.

If, by reason of advanced years or other reasons, he is not able to do the work himself, then he rents the farm and receives one-third or two-fifths of the income named without diminution of expenses, or from $50 to $60.

Conditions somewhat similar have prevailed for a number of years, so that the farmer has been compelled to use part of the reserve he may have accumulated in previous years, if he happened to be so fortunate. This reserve, however, has been exhausted in so many cases that it is only a matter of indulgence of some creditor that he is permitted to remain on the farm he has put in a lifetime accumulating.

When the dollar is used as a measure of value when considering fixed charges, income, and the market value of his land now and at the time of purchase some years ago, one is inclined to think it is high time to consider an adjustment of some kind.

Mr. President, should Congress adjourn June 10, as has been proposed, but 23 days of this session remain. We have been here since the 7th day of last December, and as no consideration whatever has been given to constructive legislation for the farmer, agriculture is not transcending the proprieties, is not assuming a privilege, but is justified in asking, when will the Senate consider constructive agricultural legislation? With but 23 days left, when are we going to act?

Mr. President, the answer should be that we will under no circumstances adjourn until such legislation is not only considered but passed by the Senate. Something to this effect was suggested by the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] the other day. He was, indeed, right.

Mr. President, agriculture must be rescued.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long in discussing the pending amendment, because I recognize the fact that most Senators have already determined their course in regard to it.

At the outset I wish to say that graduated taxation based upon the ability of the taxpayer to carry the burden is recognized as sound by every student of the problem of taxation. Nevertheless, it took a long fight to establish that principle in raising revenue to meet the costs of the Federal Government and the costs of war. It required not only a long struggle in the courts but eventually it became necessary to secure the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States before we inaugurated the system of graduated income taxation in this country. Ever since it was enacted great wealth has fought in every revenue bill to keep the rates low on large incomes.

After this country entered the World War the Government was confronted by the most stupendous problem of finance and fiscal policy in all its history. My illustrious father waged one of the most dramatic battles of his long legislative career in endeavoring to secure a tax upon great wealth and war profits commensurate with the emergency which confronted the Republic. He was defeated in that effort. While income taxes were raised higher than they had ever been in this country they were not raised as high as they were in Great Britain. It was determined at that time to finance the war more largely by the issuance of bonds.

In 1916, the year before this country entered the World War, there was a per capita Federal debt in the United States of approximately $12.50. To-day, despite the reduction of that debt in the intervening years, the Federal per capita debt of every man, woman, and child in the United States, largely due to the expenditures and the cost of the war, is approximately $150. So soon as the war was over the drive began to be made under the leadership of Secretary Mellon to reduce the taxes upon great wealth in the United States. In 1921, called before an executive session of the Senate Finance Committee, Secretary Mellon was requested to outline what he would consider an ideal taxation policy for the United States. Speaking with the freedom of that executive session, he said—and while I do not quote his exact language, I quote the substance of his remarks:

> If we could do away with all the taxes that we now have—

And I digress long enough to point out he had in mind the income and the estate taxes—

> if we could wipe out all the taxes that we now have and put a tax upon all turnovers, all sales of goods, real estate, everything, I think that would spread the burden of taxation as much as it can be spread.

He concluded by saying that he would regard the sales tax or turnover tax as an ideal system of taxation.

In keeping with his outline of a sound tax policy for the Government of the United States, in every succeeding revenue bill he used the influence and the prestige of his office as Secretary of the Treasury to secure continued reduction in the taxes upon great fortunes in the United States and upon great incomes. He was the spearhead of great wealth in the fight which took place in connection with the 1926 revenue bill to repeal the Federal estate tax.

Mr. President, great wealth is wholly conscious that so long as the system of graduated taxation stays upon the statute books of the country, ultimately there may be elected to the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol and to this Chamber representatives of the people of the United States who will vote rates of taxation upon great wealth which ultimately will call upon those who made enormous fortunes out of the distress of this Republic in its hour of trial during the war, to come forward and to pay their just share of the staggering war debt, even though we have to wait for those individuals to die in order to get it.

Mr. President, as has been repeatedly referred to by other Senators in discussing the pending amendment of the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], our country to-day faces an emergency as great as that of war. The pending amendment, recognizing that emergency, proposes that the rates in force during the war shall now be applied upon the net taxable income of individuals residing in the United States. The application of those rates will, even according to the low estimate made by the Treasury, enable us to reach the mythical point called a balanced Budget without the imposition of onerous taxes upon productive industry in this country.

The plea is made by the opponents of this proposal, however, that it would cause those enjoying large net taxable incomes, even in this period of depression, to go on a taxpayers' strike. We are asked to believe they would invest their fortunes in tax-exempt securities. In order to do so they would have to sell out their interests which they now hold in active industrial enterprise in this country.

This argument, Mr. President, I believe overlooks the fact that all of the tests which we have been able to secure under existing law indicate that no such migration of active capital representing ownership in industry takes place under the imposition of high taxes. Has any person learned that the active owner of capital in England under rates much higher than those proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, ever sold out his control in the industries of England and put his capital in hiding where it could not be taxed? Have we heard of any great flight of wealth from England under the tremendously high taxes which she was imposing in order to balance her budget in 1931? The answer is in the negative, Mr. President, and while I hold no brief on this floor for great wealth, I would hesitate to charge that those who have accumulated great fortunes in the United States are so craven that they would not be willing to come forward and to contribute their fair share levied on the basis of ability to pay in order to tide their Government over this great emergency.

The returns of estates under the estate tax law referred to by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] in the course of his remarks indicate clearly that owners of large fortunes in the United States have not to any great extent been investing the bulk of their wealth in tax-exempt securities. It is perhaps the most recent information which we have. But I wish to invite attention also to a report made by the Federal Trade Commission to the Senate in 1924 shortly after we had been imposing tremendously high income taxes, by comparison, in this country. Its report shows that for the period examined the percentage of interest on tax-exempt securities to the total taxable income of income groups of from $10,000 upward was 3.16 per cent. The report showed that the estates of decedents subject to the Federal tax for the period examined were made up of tax-exempt securities only to the extent of 7.76 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if that includes the period during which the 1918 tax was in operation?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It does not.

Mr. President, if the flight of capital from active business, envisioned by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and other Senators who have opposed the Couzens amendment should take place, I wish to propound this question: To whom would they, in this depressed market, sell the ownership of the industries which they now control? In my judgment, even assuming the lack of patriotism on the part of the owners of great fortunes in America which the Senator from Pennsylvania assumes, the practical difficulty of divesting themselves of that ownership in this depressed market and reinvesting it in tax-exempt securities would be a problem which in my judgment would cause any person with a large holding of any of the so-called prime or "blue chip" stocks in American industrial corporations, to hesitate a long time before he undertook it. No, Mr. President, I think on careful analysis any person will come to the conclusion that the imposition of the rates proposed by the Senator from Michigan in this emergent situation will not cause the flight of capital from active industry in the United States.

Mr. President, the principal reason why the Congress is now confronted with raising these enormously increased revenues for the Federal Government is that the country as a whole has been sold on the proposition of "balancing the Budget."

Personally, I do not quite understand just exactly what is meant by a "balanced Budget," whether it means that we are to attain an apparent or paper balance, and thus be able to claim that we have achieved the goal which most of the country, including the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], judging from his remarks this morning, now believes is necessary in order to bring back prosperity. If, however, we are actually interested in a balanced Budget not only on paper but in the Treasury of the United States, then I think we should subject the present Budget to a brief analysis.

It contains, as anticipated revenue, $250,000,000 in payments of interest and principal on the foreign debt. Is there any Senator in this Chamber who believes that we are going to obtain $250,000,000 in principal and interest on the foreign debt? The budget of Germany now being made up contains nothing for the payment of reparations; but, regardless of the outcome of the contest between Germany and France and other allies over reparations, is there any Senator, I repeat, in this Chamber who honestly believes that we are going to get $250,000,000 in actual payments on interest and principal on the foreign debt?

There is not a dollar in the Budget to meet the most emergent problem confronting the people of this country, namely, unemployment relief. In conjunction with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], I tried last January to direct the attention of the Senate and of the House of Representatives to the critical character of the unemployment-relief situation. After a fight on the floor of the Senate that took practically two weeks, at the end of which no Senator dared challenge the facts which we presented in the Senate, the Senate voted down a bill carrying an appropriation of $375,000,000 for unemployment relief. I repeat, Mr. President, that there is not a dollar in the Budget set-up for expenditures to meet the problem of unemployment relief.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I merely want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that since the La Follette-Costigan relief bill carrying an appropriation of $375,000,000 was voted down in January, there has been suggested a bill proposing a fund of over $2,000,000,000 for unemployment relief, and many of those who were then against the bill advocated by the Senator from Wisconsin are now favoring the larger appropriation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The measure referred to by the Senator also includes a proposal for public works. I am now confining myself to the question of unemployment relief in relation to the present Budget which we are proposing to balance by the passage of the pending tax bill.

There is not a dollar, I repeat, set up by the Budget for expenditure for unemployment relief either in 1933 or 1934. Is there any Senator who has given this problem the slightest consideration who believes that before the fiscal year 1933 has closed the Congress will not be forced to appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars in order to relieve the distress, the hunger, and the starvation in this country? Yet the Budget has not a dollar set up in it for that purpose.

Mr. President, in January, when the Costigan-La Follette bill was reported to the Senate, as a result of the testimony of experts from all over the United States who are familiar with the unemployment problem, the Senator from Colorado and myself were convinced that at that time we were asking for an amount really less than the emergent conditions required. In the meantime the resources of cities, counties, and States, staggering under the terrible load of unemployment relief, have become exhausted. At least $500,000,000 will be needed for unemployment relief if we are to prevent starvation and want beyond the ability of human beings to bear during the two fiscal years which are proposed to be covered by the pending tax bill.

Mr. President, if we really want to balance the Budget in the Treasury and not on paper, then I say that in the exercise of sound, deliberate judgment we should impose the 1918 income-tax rates. The money so raised will be required; and may I say that, unless these rates shall be imposed, it is my judgment that Congress will be called upon to pass another tax bill before the adjournment of the next session on the 4th of March, because by that time the real situation will be apparent to everyone, even to the confirmed optimists who have contended during the last two years that the present fundamental economic disaster could be cured by the application of the hocus-pocus of psychology.

The Glass bill, now the unfinished business, carries an appropriation of $125,000,000 which is not included in the Budget it is claimed the Finance Committee's bill will balance.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] stated the other day that he feared he would be driven to support the rates contained in this amendment before the depression was over but he did not want to impose them all at once. My answer to that, Mr. President, is that the time to impose these rates is now, if it is proposed to have an actually balanced Budget.

A plea is made by the opponents of the pending amendment for the people in the low income groups in the United States. I find myself somewhat confused when the two principal opponents of this amendment, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], enter a plea for those in the low taxable income group who would be called upon to contribute under the amendment now pending, while waiting in the offing, once this amendment is defeated, are these same Senators ready to come forward with a proposal to put a sales tax on the people in the low-income groups in the United States regardless of whether they have any net taxable income or not. I am not much moved when I find Senators who are pleading for those with net taxable incomes of $2,000, $3,000, $4,000, $5,000 up to $10,000, on the ground that we should not ask them to contribute a larger amount in this emergency, in the next breath urging the Senate of the United States to adopt a general sales-tax provision which will take all the way from three hundred million to three hundred and fifty million dollars out of the low and other income groups in the United States, regardless of whether they enjoy net taxable incomes or not.

Mr. President, I am only sorry that the parliamentary situation is such that the Senate, as a whole, can not go through the experience through which the Finance Committee went before this so-called compromise bill was reported to this body. I warn the Senate now that it can not escape that experience.

When the Senate hears the arguments made against the imposition of the special taxes in the bill it will be in an entirely different frame of mind, in my judgment, toward a proposal which is designed to place the greater share of this added burden upon those who are in a position to bear it, because they are enjoying even in these depressed times net taxable incomes. And do not forget, Senators, the experience that we had in the Finance Committee concerning these special taxes. After the amendment now pending had been offered in the committee and had been voted down, we proceeded then to take up the special taxes. We found a group in the committee desirous of securing the enactment of a general sales tax using their votes in the committee to emasculate the bill in so far as its revenue-producing features were concerned, in the hope obviously that if we found a gap of two or three or four hundred million dollars in the amount the bill would raise when we had finished our work we would be driven to accept the sales tax. The committee, however, did not follow that procedure. They kept in the bill many of the special taxes in which I am sure the majority of the members of the committee who voted for them did not believe.

However, when we had finished our work, we were informed by the Treasury experts there was a gap of $79,000,000 in the amount the department estimated necessary in order to balance the Budget. The committee, though, did not react as the proponents of the sales tax had hoped. Instead of adopting the sales tax the committee turned to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], which proposed to reenact the 1922 income-tax rates, estimated to raise an additional $100,000,000, plugged the gap, and thought its work was done. Then it was, Mr. President, that the Secretary of the Treasury rushed to the Capitol the next morning and proposed the compromise bill which is now before the Senate. I voted against it in the committee, and I shall follow the same course as this bill progresses through the Senate that I followed in the Finance Committee.

First of all, I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan because I believe that that is the only just way to raise this additional revenue; because I believe it is sound, not only in theory but in practice, and particularly do I believe it is sound in time of depression. If, however, this amendment is defeated, then I shall be forced to vote for many taxes upon industries, regardless of whether or not they are successful in this period, because I am unalterably opposed to the imposition of a sales tax, and because I know, as well as I know that I am standing on this floor, that if the sales tax is ever written into law it means the end of all graduated taxation in the United States.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. LONG. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan raises the income taxes in the lower brackets. The percentage appears to be very large, but the tax does not amount to so much per individual. I desire to ask the Senator this question: Inasmuch as the Senator's amendment proposes also to strike out the sales taxes, can the Senator from Wisconsin tell me if it is or is not a fact that the sales taxes that would be stricken out as a result of the plan of the Senator from Michigan would far exceed any increase in income taxes that is made in the lower brackets?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not made that calculation, but I think the Senator from Michigan has done so, and he no doubt will go into it before this amendment is disposed of.

The immediate issue, as I see it, is between the application of a sound principle of taxation, as embodied in the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, and the imposition of special taxes upon production, or a general sales tax.

I can not see how any Senator who has made a study of this subject can hesitate in choosing which course he will follow; but in my view there is a bigger issue involved than the one of balancing the Budget. The real issue involved is not only who shall be called upon to contribute in order to reach the position called a balanced Budget, but the issue which lies back of this contest is also, who shall pay for the war?

So far as I am concerned I shall ever cast my vote to call upon those best able to bear it to carry not only the burden of balancing the Budget but the burden of paying for the war.

I sincerely trust that the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATFIELD in the chair). The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

Mr. TYDINGS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Bankhead	Bingham	Bratton
Austin	Barbour	Blaine	Broussard
Bailey	Barkley	Borah	Bulkley
Bulow	George	La Follette	Shortridge
Byrnes	Glenn	Lewis	Smith
Capper	Goldsborough	Logan	Smoot
Caraway	Gore	Long	Steiwer
Carey	Hale	McGill	Stephens
Cohen	Harrison	McNary	Thomas, Idaho
Connally	Hastings	Moses	Thomas, Okla.
Coolidge	Hatfield	Norris	Trammell
Copeland	Hayden	Nye	Tydings
Couzens	Hebert	Oddie	Vandenberg

Dickinson	Jones	Robinson, Ark.	Watson
Dill	Kean	Robinson, Ind.	Wheeler
Fess	Kendrick	Schall	White
Fletcher	Keyes	Sheppard
Frazier	King	Shipstead

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, it seems that on last Saturday, when very few Senators were present, the yeas and nays were ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, so I am informed at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent to annul that order, so that I may offer an amendment to the Couzens amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The fact that the yeas and nays have been ordered does not inhibit the Senator from offering an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was informed by the clerk that it did. That is the reason why I made the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Oh, no; the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan is pending, and the Senator from Alabama may offer an amendment to it at any time prior to the vote.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well. I send to the desk an amendment to the amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Alabama offers the following amendment to the amendment: Strike out lines 1 to 10, inclusive, on page 1; also all of page 2 and lines 1 to 6, inclusive, on page 3, in the following words:

On page 9, strike out lines 19 to 25, both inclusive, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"(a) 6 per cent of the first $4,000 of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits against net income provided in section 25; and

"(b) 12 per cent of the remainder of such excess amount."

Strike out lines 5 to 25, both inclusive, on page 10, all of pages 11, 12, 13, and 14, and lines 1 to 22, both inclusive, on page 15, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"Upon a net income of $5,000 there shall be no surtax; upon net incomes in excess of $5,000 and not in excess of $6,000, 1 per cent of such excess.

"$10 upon net incomes of $6,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $6,000 and not in excess of $8,000, 2 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$50 upon net incomes of $8,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $8,000 and not in excess of $10,000, 3 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$110 upon net incomes of $10,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $10,000 and not in excess of $12,000, 4 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$190 upon net incomes of $12,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $12,000 and not in excess of $14,000, 5 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$290 upon net incomes of $14,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $14,000 and not in excess of $16,000, 6 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$410 upon net incomes of $16,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $16,000 and not in excess of $18,000, 7 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$550 upon net incomes of $18,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $18,000 and not in excess of $20,000, 8 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$710 upon net incomes of $20,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $20,000 and not in excess of $22,000, 9 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$890 upon net incomes of $22,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $22,000 and not in excess of $24,000, 10 per cent in addition of such excess."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief explanation of the effect of the amendment which has just been read.

Under the table inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from Michigan it appears that under the brackets contained in his amendment the returns would be $1,144,125,400.

Under the present law, according to the same calculation, the return would be $324,952,000. The effect of the amendment just submitted is to eliminate from the Couzens amendment the proposed increase in the brackets over the rates fixed by the Finance Committee in the brackets up to and including an income of $24,000. In other words, without any intention of going into a discussion of the principle and theory of the income tax law, the effect of this amendment is to leave upon the average business man in the reasonably low brackets the rate fixed by the Finance Committee in their report, up to an income of $24,000.

The effect of the amendment would be to reduce the revenue which would be derived under the Couzens amendment in the sum of $100,964,000, leaving as the gross return under the Couzens amendment, instead of $1,144,125,400, the sum of $1,043,161,400.

In short, the effect, in the brackets of the lower class, of the amendment tendered by me would be to reduce the amount which the Couzens amendment would produce in the sum of $100,964,000, and the Couzens amendment, with the amendment which I have proposed, would leave an increase over the present law, and under the provisions of the Couzens amendment, of $718,209,400. That would be the net result of the Couzens amendment with my amendment attached to it, and, in my judgment, it would result in the elimination of the nuisance and sales taxes, which are so burdensome and so unjust.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand the last statement made by the Senator. Would the Senator's amendment, if agreed to, increase the revenue which would be derived by the Couzens amendment as so amended?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It would decrease it by $100,000,000 but at the same time would result in an increase over the amount collected under the present law of more than $700,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. How much over the amount to be collected under the bill as reported by the Committee on Finance?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The bill as reported by the Committee on Finance would produce $642,864,000. The amount produced under the Couzens amendment, with the amendment which I have proposed, would be $1,043,000,000. So there would be an increase in the amount over the revenue estimated to be raised by the committee amendment of somewhere between $350,000,000 and $400,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senate adopted the amendment of the Senator from Alabama and the Couzens amendment, how much would that decrease the revenue which would be raised under the Couzens amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That would be $100,000,000, less than one-tenth of the amount which would be collected under the Couzens amendment without my amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Alabama have either misunderstood each other or the figures are wrong. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama, as I understand, would raise the amount to be collected under the Finance Committee bill $100,000,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No, Mr. President. The Finance Committee bill, as I have stated, would produce in round figures $642,000,000. The Couzens amendment as amended by me would produce over a billion dollars.

Mr. COUZENS. That is what I am saying, a million dollars over the amount to be collected under the Finance Committee bill.

Mr. LONG. He said a billion dollars.

Mr. COUZENS. I want to point out that in any event the amendment of the Senator from Alabama would ruin any attempt to balance the Budget without imposing sales taxes. I am not trying to do anything but balance the Budget. I am trying to harmonize the several taxes.

I contend that the reinstatement of the 1918 rates and exemptions, with which everybody has been familiar, the country having had experience under that law and knowing what it means, would mean a lesser burden on the great mass of taxpayers than they bore in 1918.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. With the permission of the Senator, I would like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Alabama. I understood the Senator from Alabama to say that the Couzens amendment as amended by his amendment, if both were adopted, would produce revenue in the amount of from $350,000,000 to $400,000,000 in excess of that which would be produced by the bill recommended by the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In other words, the committee bill would produce some $600,000,000, and the Couzens amendment, as amended by the amendment tendered by the Senator from Alabama, would produce something over $1,000,000,000?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the Senator is in error, because our authority here, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], says that the Senator is mistaken about the amendment resulting in the raising of that much money over the amount estimated to be raised by the Finance Committee bill, with the exemptions which the Senator attempts to make, up to $24,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I can only say to the Senator from Michigan that the figures are based upon a table made by himself and put into the RECORD by him. So if there are any errors in the figures, the Senator from Michigan is responsible for them.

Mr. COUZENS. That is wholly in error, because I did not put that table into the RECORD as my table. That was a table which came from the Joint Committee on Taxation, and the statement the Senator makes with respect to the increased revenue based on his amendment is in error.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I may have been in error, Mr. President, in stating that the Senator from Michigan put the table in, but the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] gave it to me as coming from the Senator from Michigan, and I find it in the RECORD.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I think there is probably just a misunderstanding between the Senators. The table was taken from several tables the Senator from Michigan offered Saturday. I took one of them and had several copies made and gave one to the Senator from Florida and another to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. COUZENS. But the Senator from Alabama is talking about another table, which he has had prepared, showing the difference between his amendment and my amendment. That is a table for which I am in no sense responsible. I am not denying my responsibility for any table I put into the RECORD on Saturday, but I assume no responsibility for the table the Senator prepared, and on which he based the amendment which he proposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I may have misunderstood the Senator from Alabama; but if I understood him correctly, the amount of revenue he anticipates from his amendment is altogether beyond reason, I will say. I may have misunderstood him, but if I understood the amendment correctly, the amount of revenue he named could not possibly be raised under that amendment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon one further remark, I answer the Senator from Utah by saying that here is the table, and I notice the Senator from Utah, who has been very solicitous that the little man should not be "stuck" by this bill, now appears to venture forth very patriotically to see that he does not get out in this bill. I say that with all good feeling.

Mr. SMOOT. What the Senator may say does not hurt me at all.

Mr. LONG. I am not going to take the further time of the Senator from Michigan, but the facts are that the Senator from Alabama—and he may have made some little miscalculation, but it can not be a very serious miscalculation—has simply exempted any increase in taxes on the man making less than $10,000 a year. So that the patriotism of the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Utah can operate in voting for the Couzens amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. COUZENS. No; I think I had better complete my statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not think the amendment of the Senator from Alabama would balance the Budget.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the fact that as he presented it, and as I understood it, under his amendment we would have only two collections in the year.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I recognize that under this bill all the collections would not be made prior to the 1st day of July. I do not know what the method of bookkeeping is, but in the statement made I said nothing about balancing the Budget. I indicated about how much more in the way of taxes this amendment would bring than would the bill reported by the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. It could not bring this year the amount the Senator stated, because of the fact that, the way the amendment was drawn, there would be only two collections made.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have made no statement about that. I discussed the increase in the receipts under the two amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. We will have to take it into consideration, because we have to balance the Budget, and the Senator's amendment would not do that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. While I have the floor temporarily——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield further.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think in fairness the Senator ought to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I want to discuss for a moment some of the statements made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], in which they showed such justifiable interest and concern over the man with an income of two, three, four, or five thousand dollars.

I yield to no man in sympathy and concern for the least privileged of our citizens. I want to ask these distinguished gentlemen, who have such a pretended concern for the men in the two, three, four, and five thousand dollar brackets, whether if we eliminated those brackets they would vote for the 65 per cent maximum.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator asks me, I say no.

Mr. COUZENS. Certainly the Senator would not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the Senator ask me?

Mr. COUZENS. I wanted that made plain, because I knew that the Senator from Mississippi was not so much concerned about the two, three, four, or five thousand dollar man as he was about the million dollar man, who paid 65 per cent. So, in order that there may be no misunderstanding, it is not so much the great concern of the opponents of the pending amendment for the little fellow, with an income of two, three, four, or five thousand dollars, as it is their concern for the fellow who makes campaign contributions, and receives from $100,000 to $1,000,000 a year.

I will point out just why, even though the sympathy of these gentlemen were genuine, it would be false. The gentlemen who want this amendment defeated and the committee rates adopted seem to overlook the fact that the difference in yield between the Finance Committee recommendation and the 1918 rates, which I propose, is exactly $56.

The same Senators who are opposed to the amendment want a 4 per cent tax on automobiles, 4 cents a gallon on lubricating oil, a tax on radios, and a tax on many other small items which in aggregate will make more of a tax than the proposal I have made to reinstate the 1918 rates. In other words, the Senators who are opposing my amendment and standing for a 4 per cent tax on automobiles, and so forth, do not seem to recognize that a man with an income of $1,500 a year, for example, who is exempted under that plan, would have to pay $40 tax on an automobile, and there is $40 of his $56 already paid out of what his income tax would be under the other plan.

I wonder what Senators who are proposing a 4 per cent tax on automobiles, 2 per cent tax on trucks, and so on, have to say about the millions of farmers and workers who have less than $2,000 per year income? Just how could they defend their opposition to taxing in an amount of $60 the man with an income of $3,000 and proposing to tax some 40,000,000 of our citizens gainfully employed who receive less than the minimum proposed in my amendment? We must assume there are from 45,000,000 to 50,000,000 of gainfully employed American citizens. Under this proposal only 7,000,000 of them are to be taxed. Under the plan of the Finance Committee, which is so vigorously indorsed and espoused by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], there would be a tax on the other 40,000,000 citizens gainfully employed which this income tax does not reach.

Mr. President, just why all this concern about the middle-class citizen who has an income of from $3,000 up to $10,000? Are these gentlemen so concerned about the class who receive $100,000, $500,000, $600,000 a year, or are they interested in the class who receive from $3,000 to $10,000? Obviously, if they are interested in those in the lower brackets they can not possibly object to my amendment, because it taxes them less than the proposal in the bill which would impose an automobile tax, a radio tax, and an admission tax. The combination of those taxes is more than the rates in the bill would impose. Under the amendment which I have offered all of these nuisance taxes may be eliminated.

For example, taking one-half of the fiscal year 1932–33—and that is where I think confusion arises in the mind of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. He is taking the whole year, while I am taking only half the year. We estimate that under the 1918 rates $486,000,000 of taxes will be collected in addition to the taxes collected under the existing rates. In the table which I presented last week I showed that we could balance the Budget with that increase. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said that estimates made by Mr. Parker, of the Joint Tax Committee, were too high, but in the schedule which I prepared the other day I did not have the $97,000,000 extra which the bill proposes to collect from brewery supplies, wort, and so forth. If we take the wort tax off of the estimate, but leave it in the bill, it would leave only $389,000,000 to be collected by adopting the 1918 rates. By the increase in rates on corporations which the committee itself proposes, there would be an aggregate of $52,000,000. Then with the higher rate which the 1918 schedule would bring in, obviously the closing of the loopholes and preventing the evasions would create a greater saving, because the greater the tax the more the saving in closing the loopholes. We have estimated that would bring in $160,000,000 additional. We cut out all taxes on production. We leave the estate-tax estimate at $10,000,000 and we take into consideration the increase on first and second class mail matter.

We include the stock-transfer tax. We increase the exemption on the admission tax from 10 cents to a minimum of 45 cents, which reduces the amount $70,000,000.

Mr. President, if there is any justification in the world for taking $70,000,000 from the people who visit the movies and pay from 10 cents to 40 cents admission, and if we do that for the purpose of taking it off of the incomes provided in this schedule, I am unable to comprehend it. In other words, the Finance Committee proposes to take $70,000,000 out of those who visit the theater and pay between 10 cents and 45 cents admission. What is that for? It is for the purpose of relieving those who receive incomes of from $3,000 to $1,000,000 and more per year. I am unable to see any justification for such tax philosophy.

Not only that, but the committee proposes to take $73,000,000 from automobile users. It is safe to say that 80 per cent of the automobiles sell for $1,000 or less. It is safe to say that probably 25,000,000 who receive less than the exemptions made in this proposal are the users of the cheap cars. In order to save those 7,000,000 citizens who receive $3,000 per year or more from having to pay an additional tax, the Finance Committee, including the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], propose to take $73,000,000 from the small automobile users and $70,000,000 from the people with little incomes who patronize the movies—what for? So that gentleman who can subscribe to party campaigns will be relieved from an additional tax.

Mr. President, I want to point out that there is not a Senator I know of who would object to paying $830 income tax on his salary. Why should a Senator or any other person receiving $10,000 a year object to paying $830 income tax during these particular times? The Finance Committee says $295, so under the proposal before us each Senator would have to pay about $500 more than the committee proposes. I do not assume that Senators are talking or voting against my proposal because of the tax upon themselves, so I must assume that they are talking about the men who are going to contribute to political campaigns. The reason why that occurs to me is because there is the strongest kind of coalition between the two sides of the Chamber with respect to income-tax rates. Even the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], able and fluent as he is, did not attempt this morning to defend charging a farmer or a little merchant struggling to get along a $40 tax on an automobile and refusing at the same time to put a tax on the people who get from $3,000 to $1,000,000 a year.

There are some Senators, including the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who said that they would vote for my amendment if we increased the exemptions. The only reason why I am as firm as I can be for the proposal as it stands is because it is a tax with which we have all had experience. It is a tax that has been on the books before. If there ever was justification for coming down into the lower brackets, it is now in preference to 1918, when the costs of living were so much higher than at present.

Everyone knows that the great volume of revenue is to be gained from the greatest number of people. No one denies that. For instance, our estimate shows that from the group with incomes of from $3,000 to $5,000 we expect under these rates to get $99,000,000. That is more out of that group than we expect to get out of the group with incomes from $1,000,000 per year up. In other words, in the group with incomes of $1,000,000 and over we expect to raise only $96,000,000, while in the group within incomes from $3,000 to $5,000 we expect to raise $99,000,000. Senators who point that out are perfectly correct. We have got to depend for this revenue upon as large a number of people as possible.

Let me refer to the brackets embracing incomes of from $5,000 to $10,000. Under this plan we expect to raise $109,620,000 in those brackets. In the brackets from $10,000 to $25,000 we expect to raise $174,960,000, or nearly twice as much as we expect to raise from the wealthy with incomes of $1,000,000 and over, according to these rates.

Everyone would like to relieve that class with incomes of $2,000, $3,000, and $5,000; but if we eliminate them we can not raise the revenue to balance the Budget and we can not eliminate the consumption and sales taxes. I submit that Senators who are proposing to increase the exemptions to a higher amount and still keep the sales tax in the bill are doing that group no good. That group, if the sales tax should be kept in the bill, will pay more than they would if we should adopt the 1918 rates. Why? Because the large revenues that we get come from the group with incomes above $2,000 and $3,000 and not from the group below $1,000, where the automobile, sales, and other similar taxes would apply.

So, Mr. President, there is no merit in the argument that we must raise the exemption from $2,000 to $2,500 or to $3,000, because should that be done it would not raise sufficient revenue to balance the Budget without imposing a consumption tax; and there is no justification for a consumption tax. Every possible effort should be made to increase consumption; every possible effort should be made to bring about the free interchange of goods; there should be no restraint on doing legal business at this particular time; and to impose a sales tax, whether it be called an excise tax or what not, would be unwise.

I want to say further that the Finance Committee pretty well recognized that fact when it first undertook to eliminate some of the taxes that were embodied in the House bill. For example, the first tax eliminated from the House bill was the tax on candy, from which it was estimated that $12,000,000 revenue could be derived. After that tax had been eliminated, the committee, when they accepted the Mills bill, with the increased tax on motor cars, lubricating oil, and so forth, eliminated the tax on toilet preparations, estimated to yield $20,000,000; on furs, estimated to yield $15,000,000; on jewelry, $15,000,000; on yachts and motor boats, $500,000; on mechanical refrigerators, $6,000,000; on sporting goods and cameras, $6,000,000; on matches, $11,000,000; on firearms, two and one-half million dollars; reduced the tax on chewing gum so as to yield $2,000,000 instead of $3,000,000, and entirely eliminated the tax on soft drinks. That shows that the committee had a conception of the unwisdom of placing a consumption tax on this group of articles.

Then, in the effort to balance the Budget, the committee adopted the rates proposed by Mr. Mills on automobiles and incomes, which, in effect, however, were less than the rates previously adopted on motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] prior to the arrival of Mr. Mills.

I say frankly I think we are going to have to come to this proposal because it is my judgment that the Senate is not going to agree to a tax on theater admissions costing from 10 to 45 cents; and I am convinced that it is not going to impose the motor-car tax or the truck tax or any of the taxes on transportation, for the very reason that it would not only affect consumption and the motor-car industry, but it would affect every automobile dealer, of whom there are thousands throughout the United States who are now on the verge of bankruptcy because of the decreased volume of business. It would also affect every gas station. So the effect of such a tax would not be confined to one State, a State that produces in the first place the motor car, but it would have a nation-wide injurious effect upon garages, oil stations, and automobile dealers. Therefore, Mr. President, it would be absolutely unsound to eliminate these income taxes with the idea of removing a brake upon business.

When the Senate finds that we have reduced the revenue by $70,000,000 in the case of admission taxes and by $73,000,000 in the case of motor-car taxes—and those taxes will be eliminated—it will return to raising the necessary revenue from the only reliable and honest source from which it can be obtained.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to make what I believe to be a practical suggestion. I am not in disagreement with the Senators who support the amendment to the amendment; but I believe I can convince them that it is a mistake to offer it now. Under ordinary circumstances I would most enthusiastically support it. If we were not confronted with the conditions which face us and which are going to make it necessary for us to do some very painful things in the revenue bill, I would support the amendment to the amendment. I should like to give the relief that it would afford to incomes less than $10,000, but, Mr. President, much of what the Senator from Michigan has stated is true. Taxes may not have to be levied on all the particular items he has mentioned, but there will have to be levied on some of the items that we would like to take out of this bill, unless we raise the money from incomes, as provided for in his amendment to the extent at least that the amendment will raise revenue.

The Couzens amendment exempts all incomes below a net income of $2,000. In my judgment, those who have such a small income as that ought to be relieved entirely from an income tax if we were not presented with a condition where, unless we ask them to bear some of the burden under the income tax, we are going to be compelled to levy a tax on the incomes of less than $2,000. I do not see any escape from that conclusion.

But, however we may disagree about that, I want to call the attention of those who favor this amendment to the amendment to the fact that, as I look at it, we who would like to relieve as much as we can the small income-tax payers are going to divide our forces. If we follow the parliamentary tactics suggested, we will have against the Couzens amendment those who want to relieve the small taxpayer and also those who want to relieve the big taxpayer. We will have both against the amendment; the amendment will be defeated; and then opportunity, of which we ought to avail ourselves, to present the amendment which I am going to suggest to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama will probably have been lost.

Why not let us vote directly on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan? If it shall be defeated, then the Senator from Alabama or any other Senator in the Chamber can offer the Couzens amendment over again with the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. In other words, a Senator may at once offer the amendment of the Senator from Michigan with the increased rates on incomes below $10,000 stricken out. It seems to me that is plain. I should like to support such an amendment if that time comes; I should like to support the amendment to the amendment; but, feeling as I do, I can not support it as an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

I am afraid—and I am going to submit a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair in order to obtain the opinion of the Chair—that we will lose our opportunity to do that if we follow the course of those who are behind the amendment now proposed to the so-called Couzens amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. KING. In view of the statement just made by the Senator, I am a little at a loss to understand what the Bankhead amendment is. As I understand it——

Mr. NORRIS. The Bankhead amendment provides——

Mr. KING. In order that the Senator may understand my question, let me proceed for a moment.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. KING. I understood the Bankhead amendment to revert to the rates of the pending bill on incomes up to $24,000, and not $10,000 as suggested by the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. It does apply to incomes up to $24,000, does it?

Mr. LONG. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. That is another objection to it. I thought it only applied to those up to $10,000. I am wrong about that, am I?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. The Bankhead amendment does not relieve any taxpayers from taxation except those under $10,000. It simply superimposes upon the Couzens amendment the provisions of the pending bill found on pages 1 and 2 and lines from 1 to 6 on page 3.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NORRIS. First let me understand the amendment aright. I thought I understood that the proposed amendment attempted to strike out of the Couzens amendment everything applying to incomes of less than $10,000. Am I wrong about that?

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator is wrong, because the amendment of the Senator from Alabama proposes to eliminate all of the rates provided in my amendment up to incomes of $25,000.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to know as to that. I will ask the Senator from Alabama if that is correct?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It does eliminate the rates proposed in the pending amendment up to incomes of $25,000, but I am willing to reduce it to $10,000.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say to the Senator that standing alone I could not support that amendment. I am willing, Mr. President, to relieve incomes below $10,000; any Senator ought to be willing to do so; but think for a moment of relieving our own incomes when we are going to levy a tax that is going to be a terrible hardship on everybody else.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I wish to point out to the Senator that the Senator from Alabama as yet is not certain how much money under his amendment, if adopted, would be lost to the Treasury, and the amendment he offers is not as yet clearly understood. His proposal is to take out of the amendment which I have proposed all the rates on pages 1 and 2 and up to line 6 on page 3, and return to the rates of the existing law—not even to return to the rates proposed when the bill was reported by the Finance Committee or those of the House bill, but to return to the rates of existing law.

Mr. NORRIS. That is still worse.

Mr. COUZENS. That is still worse.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want, in the best of faith, to suggest to Senators who would like to go a little further than the Couzens amendment does go for the relief of persons with small incomes that they wait until we vote on the Couzens amendment. Of course, if the Couzens amendment shall be adopted it will go into the bill, and it will be too late to do it then; but it seems to me we ought to take a practical view of the parliamentary situation. On the other hand——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment. On the other hand, if the Couzens amendment shall be defeated, then let an amendment be proposed—and I would support it with all the enthusiasm I possess—similar to the Couzens amendment, but with all the references in the Couzens amendment to incomes up to and including $5,000 eliminated. That will leave the pending bill before the Senate, of course, and we will only amend it, if we act according to the Couzens amendment, from $10,000 on up to $1,000,000 and over.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. On Saturday, in discussing the Couzens amendment, I suggested that if the present amendment were defeated that would leave the language of the bill as it stands, and any bracket might be amended if the Senate saw fit to do so. I understood that the Senator from Nebraska did not agree with that suggestion.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I do not disagree with that.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator's present statement indicates that he does agree with it. In ther words, if we vote down the Couzens amendment, any amendment will then be in order to the text of the bill and to any bracket in the income-tax section.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. I said on Saturday that of course any bracket in the Couzens amendment is subject to amendment just the same.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, yes; it is, undoubtedly; but since the same sort of an amendment can be offered to the text of the bill in the event of the defeat of the Couzens amendment, does not that leave us in a better parliamentary situation to work out a measure based upon the language of the bill as it is brought in, rather than to try to amend the amendment of the Senator from Michigan as is proposed here?

Mr. NORRIS. I think that would depend upon the idea of Senators in voting on these amendments, as to whether they wanted to increase the rates proposed in the bill in accordance with the Couzens amendment. For one, I do. I want to do that.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand; but the fate of the Couzens amendment, unless it is adopted, would have no effect upon the amendability of any part of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; and that is the point I wanted to make. I wanted, if I could, to induce the Senators who are behind this amendment to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. Right on that point, however, let me say that I think we are going to divide our forces. Would not the Senators who are behind the so-called Bankhead amendment rather have the Couzens amendment than to have the bill as it is now?

I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I wanted to make a suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska. Of course, as I have expressed myself, I am opposed to the Couzens amendment and to any other amendment that changes the recommendation of the Finance Committee—namely, a 45 per cent surtax, and the normal tax that we recommend. As suggested by the Senator from Michigan, however, under the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama we would go back to the present law as to incomes of $24,000 a year and less.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. If it was the intention of the Senator from Alabama to offer the amendment to the Senate Finance Committee recommendation—and that was what I understood him to mean; namely, on incomes of $24,000 or less to take the rates proposed by the Finance Committee, but to take the Couzens rates on incomes of $25,000 and up—this would be the situation:

The man who had an income of $23,999.99 would pay an income tax of $620; but if he had an income of $24,000 and 1 cent, or a difference of 2 cents, he would pay $1,090.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. In other words, the amendment is rather crudely drawn to meet that particular situation; and, notwithstanding the fact that I am not in sympathy with what is attempted to be done, it seems to me that there ought to be a straight vote on the Couzens amendment, which would not preclude the Senator from Alabama or any other Senator from offering his proposition afterwards, and letting the proposition come up straight.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Mississippi has stated in very plain language what I have been trying to tell the Senate myself—that it is, in my judgment, a strategical mistake to offer this amendment now.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I agree with the effort the Senator from Nebraska is making. However, I should like to call his attention to this fact:

We know that the so-called Ogden Mills effort, which anyone may support or not support, is not worrying about the taxes on the little incomes; but we have got to relieve the minds of some Senators who are of the opinion that they are fighting for the little man.

As a matter of fact—and that is why I agree to some extent with the strategy of the Senator from Alabama—if the Senator had drawn in the beginning, as he says he is now willing to do, an amendment excepting incomes up to $10,000—I understood the Senator to say that it was his intention to amend the present bill in that way—it would have meant that then we could have given some of the distinguished Senators who want to assist the lower strata of life a chance to put themselves genuinely on record. We need that chance, if I may say so to the Senator from Nebraska, so that we can remove the fog and let them put themselves on record, rather than to have the Couzens amendment voted down.

I fear that we are going to divide our forces. That is just what I am trying to avoid. It seems that there is a pretty well-organized force in favor of the Mills amendments. At one time they are undertaking to save the little man. At the same time they are slapping on his back a sales tax that is double what the income tax would be. The next time they are trying to keep the poor big man from being imposed on.

Mr. NORRIS. They do not say much about that.

Mr. LONG. No.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not speak for anybody else; but I look at things usually, I think, as the ordinary man does. I believe that the Senators who are desirous of raising the money necessary would like at the same time to raise it out of the incomes of those who can best afford it. Realizing, however, the amount that we must raise, and realizing that we will have to inflict a hardship upon somebody and that the taxes in the Couzens amendment on the man with an income of $5,000 or of $3,000 make a comparatively light levy more than it ought to be—something that I should like to eliminate if I could—unless we add something to these income taxes we are going, by some method of a sales tax or otherwise, to add to the tax of those who have still smaller incomes, as the Senator has so well pointed out.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to call attention to another tax in this bill which has not been mentioned yet. I think it is a worse tax than the tax on automobiles. I think it is a worse tax than the tax on theater tickets. It is a worse tax than almost any other tax in the bill; and I should like, if I can, to pave the way so that when we come to it we can eliminate it. I refer to the tax on checks.

I have in my office letters on this subject from representatives of cooperative organizations, mostly farmer cooperative organizations, creamery organizations, and similar cooperative organizations. I am told that one of these cooperative organizations, having its membership about equally divided between Kansas and Nebraska, has over 3,000 members who are getting checks every week. As a rule they are small checks—two, three, five, six, and seven dollars, very seldom going over $10, but sometimes going over that. In the case of this one institution this nuisance tax will result in its paying thousands and thousands of dollars; but the man who has an income of a million dollars can pay his tax of over $700,000 all with one check, and that will cost him only 2 cents.

It seems to me that is a great injustice. The tax will raise quite a sum of money; but it is coming altogether, almost 100 per cent, out of poor people whose incomes are less than $2,000, most of them on the farms, the men who have been deflated until almost all of them are nearly bankrupt.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I estimate the amount of tax that the cooperative organization the Senator has referred to would have to pay, if the rate levied in this bill were enacted into law, to be $3,000 a year.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the estimate is too low, although the Senator has had a better opportunity to know than I, because my information is based on the letters I get from these cooperative institutions.

Senators, nobody for a moment says that institutions of that kind ought to be taxed. You can not get a voice anywhere to be raised in favor of such a tax. It is conceded by everybody that they ought not to be taxed; and what will they do? It is almost an impossibility for these small bills to be paid in cash. Checks have to be sent through the mails as a rule. We have all been trying, I think honestly and earnestly, to relieve agriculture from the terrible dilemma in which it is placed and has been placed for several years. Now we propose in this bill—we will have to do something of that kind if we do not raise this money by income taxes—to tax the farmer cooperative organizations that for years we have been exerting our influence and appropriating money to organize, on the theory that something should be done to assist the men who work and toil in the field and produce the food we eat and the clothing we wear, not getting paid any interest on their investment, not getting paid the cost of production. We propose now to levy this unholy tax upon their already overburdened shoulders.

I do not want to deceive anybody. The Couzens amendment may be agreed to and that tax may still stay in the bill; but do not forget that unless we do increase the revenue that comes from these great incomes we will be almost without an argument when we come to the so-called nuisance taxes and try to relieve the struggling people from their great burdens.

A 2-cent tax does not mean anything to the man worth a million dollars, but 2 cents means something to the men and the women who toil 16 hours a day and get a check at the end of the week for perhaps $2.50. Put it on a percentage basis and see what you get.

So I want to call the attention of Senators to the fact that when we get through with the income-tax provisions of this bill we shall not have finished it by any means; and we ought to commence now to pave the way so that when we come to those provisions of the bill we shall not be compelled to levy taxes upon the people who do the most work and who get the least for it.

Why not give us a straight vote on the Couzens amendment? If it goes in, it will help us materially to meet the other fights that we shall have to meet before we get through this bill. If it fails, then this amendment can be offered; and while it will not go as far or raise as much money as the Couzens amendment if we leave intact the tax on incomes of $10,000 a year and up, I will give it my most hearty and enthusiastic support.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in view of the request of the Senator from Nebraska, with whose views I am very largely in accord, I am willing to withdraw the amendment if I may have unanimous consent to offer it later.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not have to have such consent, unless the Couzens amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think that is the idea the Senator has in mind, that in case the Couzens amendment should be adopted, he may have leave afterwards to offer his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Alabama, that in case the Couzens amendment shall be agreed to, he may propose the amendment now pending to the Couzens amendment? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I withdraw my proposed amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if no one else desires to speak, I shall make a point of no quorum, so that Senators may be present before the vote is taken.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Hull	Pittman
Austin	Costigan	Johnson	Reed
Bailey	Couzens	Jones	Robinson, Ark.
Bankhead	Cutting	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.
Barbour	Davis	Keyes	Schall
Barkley	Dickinson	King	Sheppard
Bingham	Dill	La Follette	Shipstead
Blaine	Fess	Lewis	Shortridge
Borah	Fletcher	Logan	Smith
Bratton	Frazier	Long	Smoot
Broussard	George	McGill	Stephens
Bulkley	Glenn	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Bulow	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Trammell
Byrnes	Gore	Morrison	Tydings
Capper	Hale	Moses	Vandenberg
Caraway	Harrison	Norbeck	Walcott
Carey	Hastings	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Cohen	Hayden	Nye	Walsh, Mont.
Connally	Hebert	Oddie	Watson
Coolidge	Howell	Patterson	White

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If the Senate should adopt the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, it would then become a part of the bill; and would it be open to amendment after it had once been agreed to, without a motion to reconsider the vote, so that amendments to it might be offered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would not be, except under the unanimous-consent agreement given, that the Senator from Alabama might propose his amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is my view of the parliamentary situation—that it would require unanimous consent, after the amendment had once been adopted, if it should be adopted. Therefore I desire to offer an amendment, while the amendment is in order, to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HARRISON. May I suggest to the Senator from Florida, who was temporarily out of the Chamber, that it was desired that there should be a straight vote on the Couzens amendment. I think the same privilege should be granted to the Senator from Florida that was granted to the Senator from Alabama. So I ask unanimous consent that after the vote is taken, if the amendment of the Senator from Michigan should be agreed to, permission shall be given to the Senator from Florida to offer his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let the amendment to the amendment be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Florida offers the following amendments: On page 1 of the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, in line 3, strike out "six" and insert in lieu thereof "three"; and in line 6, as part of paragraph (b), preceding the numeral "12," insert "6 per cent upon the excess to $6,000 and."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, may I explain the purpose of the amendment to the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The amendment sent to the desk by me proposes that on the first $4,000 of net income the rate shall be 3 per cent. Under the proposal of the Senator from Michigan it would be 6 per cent. Three per cent is the rate recommended by the Finance Committee on the first $4,000.

The next paragraph of the amendment proposes that on incomes of from $4,000 to $6,000 the rate shall be 6 per cent, instead of 12 per cent, as proposed by the Senator from Michigan. On net incomes over and above $6,000 the rate would be as it is in the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, 12 per cent.

The object of my amendment I think is very apparent. It is for the purpose of endeavoring to protect those with small and medium incomes, to prevent having the enormous increase of $124,000,000 made in the taxes upon people within those brackets.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What would be the loss to the Treasury from the change proposed by the Senator from Florida?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It would amount to a reduction of $124,000,000 in the taxes on people receiving incomes of from one up to five thousand dollars a year.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So the amount that would be raised would be $124,000,000 less than the amount which would be raised under the amendment of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It would be that amount removed from the revenue raised on the small incomes, according to the statistics. It would remove the increase of $124,000,000, as proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, over the amount recommended by the Committee on Finance.

It would not interfere with any other provision of the bill. Of course, I am very much opposed, myself, to the reductions proposed in the exemptions. The Senator from Michigan proposes to cut the exemption from $3,500 down to $2,000 on a married man, and to reduce the exemption for minors from $400 down to $200 per annum. Anyone knows that $200 a year is not sufficient to support a minor, even to give him the necessities of life, much less to give him reasonable educational opportunities. Yet the Senator proposes to strike out $400 and to insert $200. I desire to offer an amendment to that feature of his amendment at a later time.

Mr. DILL. Why does not the Senator include that in the amendment now offered?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It is altogether a different part of the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. DILL. The Senator ought to fix it so that it would be affected by the unanimous-consent agreement, if possible.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Of course, it is a matter of parliamentary procedure. Some may oppose the feature reducing the exemption from $2,500 down to $2,000, and think we should allow an exemption of only $200 for the support and education of minors, and others may think it ought to be $400. So the whole situation would be involved if we went to offering amendments to every feature of the amendment.

I wish to have the issue passed on as to whether or not we should raise revenue over and above the amount estimated by the Senate committee to the extent of $124,000,000 through taxes upon people in this country who have incomes of from one to five thousand dollars a year only.

Mr. HARRISON. As I understand the Senator's amendment, he resurrects the Senate Finance Committee's recommendation as to the first four thousand, of 3 per cent?

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. And in the $2,000 bracket he provides for 6 per cent, and above that, 9 per cent?

Mr. TRAMMELL. No; the remainder I leave just as it is set forth in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan. In other words, above incomes of $6,000 the rate would go up to that proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

I think $124,000,000 is the amount that would be taken off taxpayers who have incomes of from one to five thousand dollars per annum.

Mr. COUZENS. May I ask the Senator whether he consents to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is satisfactory to me. Of course, personally, and as a matter of parliamentary procedure, representing my own views, what I favor more or less is an amendment proposed by someone else. There may be very objectionable features in the amendment I offered. I much prefer trying to perfect it before having a vote upon the whole question. Some others would rather proceed the other way, perhaps.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I object.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Washington objects anyway.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, was the request of the Senator from Mississippi granted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not. Objection was made.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have an amendment lying on the desk which affects this same matter. As a part of my amendment the provision in the bill relating to normal taxes on incomes would be changed along with other items in the bill. The amendment is one relating to an alteration in the national prohibition act. It does not seem to me quite fair that it should be impossible to secure a vote on this amendment which is lying on the table, and yet I understand that if the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Michigan and about to be voted on is agreed to, then the amendment which I have on the desk will be out of order. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct; that is, it applies to the same provision as that covered by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is there no way by which a vote can be secured on some of the other amendments, such as that presented by the Senator from Florida, after the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is voted upon?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent was given to vote on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. There was objection to the unanimous-consent request for a vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] in the event the Couzens amendment should be adopted. The question now is upon the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment, and no further amendment is in order at this time. The yeas and nays have been demanded. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is necessarily absent. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). Upon this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. Not knowing how he would vote, I shall withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON], who is necessarily absent. I accordingly withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE], who is absent. Therefore I withhold my vote. If privileged to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent. I do not know how he would vote on this question. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. HULL. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is detained by illness.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] are necessarily out of the city.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] has a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

I also wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART.]

The result was announced—yeas 4, nays 76, as follows:

YEAS—4

So the amendment of Mr. TRAMMELL to the amendment of Mr. COUZENS was rejected.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I take it that this vote clarifies the remarks of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I suppose the distinguished gentlemen who voted against excepting from the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] incomes up to $5,000 intended by their vote to clarify any misgivings that may have been had as to whether this would be an imposition upon men of moderate means.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the Senator from Louisiana that the reason why I voted against it was because I was trying to carry out the wishes of the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that we would get a straight vote on the Couzens amendment. That is what prompted me to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. LONG. That may have been the Senator's reason, but the facts of the case are that I find myself, I think, reading mere words and figures from which there can be no human misconception that the Senator from Mississippi, I feel, and no doubt other Senators who have voted as he has voted, have seen some reason for changing their minds. The Couzens amendment, which simply proposes to put an income tax more or less upon the people earning incomes, has been opposed by the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. I believe the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania brought out the fact that it would impose these enormous increased income taxes upon men with small incomes. Now, when the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] offers an amendment proposing to rescue the men with incomes of less than $5,000, following the advice I understood to have been given by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and his cohorts, we find that we have an amendment against which they themselves have voted.

So now there is no fog in this matter. It is simply a proposition of whether or not wealth is to be taxed, incomes are to be taxed, and if a tax is going to be levied upon the men who are making money in the United States to-day in proportion to what they are earning. That is the only issue now before the Senate. The solicitude which might have been expressed by Mr. Mills for the poor man apparently finds very little support here in this body, so that the proposal of the Senator from Michigan certainly ought not to leave any one with any misunderstanding. It is simply whether we are going to resort to a sales tax and place the burden of collecting the funds to support the Government upon the masses to bear, or whether or not we are going to allow the Government to be supported by the people who are earning the incomes. Now that these distinguished Senators have had presented to them and been given an opportunity to vote upon a proposal to except the little man, and apparently have decided not to except him, inasmuch as that is the one provision they have urged, they should see fit to support the Couzens amendment, which carries with it income taxes on the people who are earning the money in this country.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is mysterious how difficult it is for some to grasp the real issue in a proposition when it is presented. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] has offered a carefully framed plan for the purpose of imposing the revenue-bearing obligations principally upon income, and his plan necessarily recognizes the fact that if it is to be carried out there must be substantial increases on the smaller incomes.

Think for a moment what would happen to the plan of the Senator from Michigan if we struck from it the provision which contemplates heavy increases on the smaller incomes. Everyone here knows that the greater amount of the revenues to be raised by the plan comes in the aggregate from the lower brackets. If we strike out the proposal of the Senator from Michigan, or modify it so that only low rates would be imposed on the smaller incomes and the higher rates be carried into effect on the large incomes, the total amount of revenue raised by the plan would be comparatively small. The real test here, of course, is between the two plans, that reported by the Finance Committee and the plan offered by the Senator from Michigan. If we take most of the revenue out of the plan of the Senator from Michigan, the Senator from Michigan himself would not be for it. I see he nods his head in approval of my statement. The fair thing to do is to meet the test between the two plans, and that is what will be done as the result of the vote just taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE], and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. If he were present, I understand he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote "nay." I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, and will withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCNARY (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). As heretofore announced, I am paired on this question with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON]. In his absence

I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DICKINSON. I desire to announce the pair of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART]. My understanding is that if the Senator from Colorado were present he would vote "nay," and if the Senator from Iowa were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. COUZENS (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to change my vote from "yea" to "nay" for the purpose of filing a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HASTINGS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] are necessarily absent, being out of the city.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays, 49, as follows:

So Mr. COUZENS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have pending an amendment which proposes to amend not simply the Senate committee amendment but also portions of the House text. It is all comprehended in one amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair, the amendment will be in order.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, later, after the Senate completes the committee amendments, would my amendment then be in order? I do not desire to urge it now. If it is in order, I prefer to wait until a later time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would be in order if it proposes to strike out more than merely the Senate committee amendment. The Chair understands it proposes to strike out portions of the House text?

Mr. CONNALLY. It proposes to strike out portions of the House text and portions of the Senate committee amendment which probably will be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment would be in order.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to Senators that my amendment proposes the relevying of the 1922 tax rates as revealed on the chart hanging on the wall. In view of the vote which has just been cast, I think that after the Senate mulls over a lot of the objectionable excise taxes a little later in the bill it will be more in a frame of mind than it is at present to embrace my amendment. Therefore, I shall withhold pressing the amendment at this time, with the understanding that we will have an opportunity to return to it a little later in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me ask the Senator, before he lays the amendment aside, what revenue the 1922 rates would produce?

Mr. CONNALLY. They would produce something like $125,000,000 more than would be produced by the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is that a Treasury estimate?

Mr. CONNALLY. It is the estimate of the joint committee on taxation, which I regard as much more reliable and dependable than the estimate of the Treasury.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Has the Treasury made an estimate?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know that the Treasury has. I will say that this is the amendment which was adopted by the Finance Committee just before it got ready to report the bill and which was taken out of the bill because of the insistence of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, the following morning. The estimates are that it will raise about $125,000,000 more than the provisions of the bill as reported by the Senate committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The Treasury Department estimates that it will raise $100,000,000 more.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Treasury, I will say to the Senator from Michigan, according to the Senator from Utah, estimates that it will raise $100,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. When was the estimate made? The hearings upon the bill ran for several weeks, and I should like to get the date so as to form a correct idea as to whether the estimate ought to be accepted and whether it is reliable or not.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. MOSES. If we now proceed in an orderly fashion and agree to the amendment proposed by the committee, the Senator from Texas will not be in a position to offer the amendment which he has in mind unless he completely recasts its form. He can not then offer an amendment which affects the committee amendment as agreed to by the Senate. Is not that the fact?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that if the amendment covers more than the committee amendment, if it covers an additional part of the House text, it is in order.

Mr. MOSES. Regardless of the time when it is offered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Regardless of the time when it is offered.

Mr. MOSES. I have grave doubt of that, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not looked up the point, but, offhand, that is his opinion.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, can either the President of the Senate or the President pro tempore give any assurance as to which will be in the chair when my amendment comes up? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOSES. I think, Mr. President, that both of us can assure the Senator from Texas that we will have agreed upon a ruling before that time comes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Had not the Senator from Texas better change the form of his amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY. I offer the amendment at this time and ask unanimous consent that it may be laid aside for the present.

Mr. MOSES. In that event the committee amendment will also have to be laid aside.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senate may consent to lay aside the whole income-tax schedule for the present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think unanimous consent can be obtained to lay aside the whole income-tax schedule for the present.

Mr. CONNALLY. Well, the object of my inquiry was to try to determine the question. Now, rather than to wait, as suggested by the President pro tempore of the Senate, and have it decided after it is too late——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, why can not the Senator ask to have the amendment considered right now?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas can ask to have it considered right now, but the Senator knows that from the temper of the Senate, in view of the last vote, that it is in no mind really to consider my amendment on its merits.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senate is.

Mr. CONNALLY. But after the Senate has followed the Senator from Utah around over this Chamber on these excise taxes and has had its patience galled and worn threadbare, it will be ready to go back and raise $125,000,000 under this amendment, which will hurt nobody, which will not hurt productive business or unproductive business, for that matter, but will save the imposition of a great many annoying and obnoxious taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator's statement is correct, it seems to me we ought to decide this question now. Then, if the Senator's amendment should be adopted, perhaps the Senator can secure enough votes to take a lot of the other items out of the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I will offer my amendment now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Texas offers the following amendment:

On page 9, strike out lines 19 to 25, both inclusive (relating to rates of normal tax on individuals), and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) Four per cent of the first $4,000 of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits against net income provided in section 25; and

"(b) Eight per cent of the remainder of such excess amount."

On page 10, strike out lines 5 to 25, both inclusive, all of pages 11, 12, 13, and 14, and lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 15 (relating to surtax rates on individuals), and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Upon a net income of $6,000 there shall be no surtax; upon net incomes in excess of $6,000 and not in excess of $10,000, 1 per cent of such excess.

"$40 upon net incomes of $10,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $10,000 and not in excess of $12,000, 2 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$80 upon net incomes of $12,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $12,000 and not in excess of $14,000, 3 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$140 upon net incomes of $14,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $14,000 and not in excess of $16,000, 4 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$220 upon net incomes of $16,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $16,000 and not in excess of $18,000, 5 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$320 upon net incomes of $18,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $18,000 and not in excess of $20,000, 6 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$440 upon net incomes of $20,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $20,000 and not in excess of $22,000, 8 per cent in addition of such excess.

"$600 upon net incomes of $22,000; and upon net incomes in excess of $22,000 and not in excess of $24,000, 9 per cent in addition of such excess.

"(c) In the case of a single person, a personal exemption of $1,000; or in the case of the head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife, a personal exemption of $2,500, unless the net income is in excess of $5,000, in which case the personal exemption shall be $2,000. A husband and wife living together shall receive but one personal exemption. The amount of such personal exemption shall be $2,500, unless the aggregate net income of such husband and wife is in excess of $5,000, in which case the amount of such personal exemption shall be $2,000. If such husband and wife make separate returns, the personal exemption may be taken by either or divided between them. In no case shall the reduction of the personal exemption from $2,500 to $2,000 operate to increase the tax which would be payable if the exemption were $2,500 by more than the amount of the net income in excess of $5,000."

During the reading of the amendment—

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, evidently nobody is following the Chief Clerk, so, to save time, I move that the rest of the amendment be considered as read.

Mr. KING. No; let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LONG. I object.

After the reading of the amendment—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, in raising the large amount of revenue which it is going to be necessary to raise under this bill I believe it is much sounder policy to raise that revenue out of profits than to undertake to raise it by taxing businesses or enterprises which are not producing profits.

I have proposed an amendment which will increase the revenues over the bill of the Senate committee in a calendar year by $158,000,000. In other words, the rates of normal taxes and surtaxes proposed by my amendment in operation over an entire calendar year would add $158,000,000 to the revenue. For the fiscal year 1933, however, since only six months of that period will be covered, the amendment will raise approximately $113,000,000 more than the Senate Finance Committee bill.

Mr. President and Senators, the Finance Committee of the Senate, after working with this bill for four weeks, adopted the amendment which I now offer. It was adopted late one afternoon because of the imperative necessity of raising $77,000,000 additional to the amount the bill then carried if the Budget was to be balanced. On the following morning the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, made a call upon the Finance Committee, and the particular object of his attack was the amendment which I had offered and which had been adopted the night before.

The meeting between the committee and Secretary Mills on that morning resulted in placing the admissions tax, for instance, on admissions from 10 cents up to 45 cents. Theretofore admissions had been taxed only in the case of those costing 45 cents and above; but the Secretary of the Treasury insisted upon taxing all admissions from 45 cents down to 10 cents, and the committee followed him. He also insisted on the bank-check tax. He also insisted on a number of other forms of excise tax. The purpose of the Secretary in urging the adoption of those taxes was to get rid of the income-tax amendment which I had offered and which had been adopted by the committee.

Mr. President, Senators need not become excited about the burdens of the rates proposed in this amendment. In general, they are the same rates that we paid in 1922, with the exception that in 1922 the surtaxes stopped at incomes of $200,000, while in my amendment I have continued to graduate the surtaxes by slow degrees until they reach a rate of 55 per cent on that portion of incomes above $1,000,000.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I refer again to the chart which is upon the wall. Does the 1922 line upon that chart represent the Senator's amendment in the form in which he has proposed to change the 1922 law, or does it represent the 1922 law without the Senator's change?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator from Michigan that the chart which I indicate by the pointer illustrates the rates carried in my amendment. The rates are identical with the 1922 rates, except for the fact that the surtaxes stopped in 1922 at $200,000. My amendment carries those surtaxes on to a million dollars, with a maximum rate of 55 per cent on that portion above a million dollars.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And the chart represents the Senator's figures?

Mr. CONNALLY. The chart represents my amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me illustrate. Under the Senate committee bill, the person with a net income of $3,000 would pay a tax of $4. A tax of $4 on a man with a net income of $3,000 will not pay for the annoyance of filing a return.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, on the chart it is indicated that a man with that income would pay $20.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am talking about the Senate committee bill. Under the Senate Finance Committee bill a man with an income of $3,000 would pay a tax of only $4. He must keep books all the year, and go to the annoyance of filing a return, and after he has done that, he pays the small sum of $4, which would not compensate the Government for the accounting cost and auditing the return.

Under the amendment which I have offered one with an income of $3,000 would pay $20, not a burdensome tax. With a net income of $3,000, $20 is not a burdensome tax. Under the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, which was defeated, the same income-tax payer would have paid $60, whereas under my amendment he would pay $20.

Under the amendment now pending a $5,000 net income-tax payer would pay only $100, as against $180 under the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, and under the committee bill $56. I submit that a net income of $5,000 is not taxed in a burdensome manner when the taxpayer pays a hundred dollars.

Net income means income after expenses and deductions, other than the $2,500 deduction. On a $3,000 net income the tax would be computed after deducting $2,500. Four per cent on $500 would be $20. When we speak of net income the deductions allowed for married men and single men have not yet been deducted.

In the case of a net income of $10,000, under the amendment of the Senator from Michigan the taxpayer would have paid $830; under my amendment he would pay $520; under the Finance Committee bill only $295.

With a net income of $30,000, under my amendment a man would pay in taxes $3,520, a little more than 10 per cent on a $30,000 income. That is not burdensome; that is not a heavy tax. What man with an income of $30,000, in this period of depression and dire necessity, is unwilling or unable to pay the Federal Government $3,500 in the form of taxes?

Mr. GORE. What would the tax be on such an income under the Senate committee bill?

Mr. CONNALLY. It would be $3,140 against $3,520 under my amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. The tax under the Senator's amendment would be a little less than $400 more?

Mr. CONNALLY. It would be a little less than $400 more.

Mr. GORE. What would it have been under the Couzens amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY. Forty-nine hundred dollars. With an income of $50,000, under the Couzens amendment a taxpayer would have been taxed $11,030. Under the amendment now pending, offered by me, he would be taxed $8,640. Under the Senate Finance Committee bill the tax would be $8,040.

With an income of $100,000, under the Couzens amendment a taxpayer would have been charged $35,030. Under my amendment he would pay $30,140 and under the Senate committee bill $28,440.

With an income of $200,000, under the Couzens amendment the tax would have been $101,030, under the amendment now pending the tax would be $86,040, and under the pending bill the tax would be $77,940.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that under the 1922 act surtaxes were not carried beyond $200,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Looking at those charts, it appears that the highest income taxes ever levied were in 1918 and that of all the changes made since 1922, the rates in the pending Senate committee bill, now before the Senate, are the highest.

Mr. CONNALLY. They are higher in some cases. In 1924, for instance, the normal tax on an income of $3,000 was $8.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is the only case.

Mr. CONNALLY. Whereas under the Finance Committee bill it is only $4.

Mr. TYDINGS. Except as to the $3,000 item, the pending Senate committee rates are higher than the rates in all other years except 1918, 1919, and 1922?

Mr. CONNALLY. That seems to be correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. That was the point I wanted to make.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me indicate to the Senate how I have graduated the surtaxes from $200,000 up.

On an income of $500,000, under the 1922 act the revenue was $260,640. My amendment would make it $263,640. But I will say to the Senator from Michigan that I was slightly in error awhile ago, because my rates on the surtaxes are a little higher than they were in 1922, and that accounts for the difference.

On an income of $1,000,000, under the amendment I have offered, a taxpayer would pay $571,140, as against $703,000 under the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, and as against $492,940 under the Senate Finance Committee bill.

The surtax graduation, beginning at $200,000, is by slow stages of 1 and 2 per cent at a time, so as to make the increase of the rates gradual rather than sudden, by differentiation of as much as half a million dollars.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then the Senator's amendment would produce, roughly, between $100,000,000 and $120,000,000 a year more revenue than the Senate Finance Committee bill would produce?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator that I pointed out a few minutes ago that under the amendment offered by me, for a calendar year the increase over the Senate committee bill would be $158,000,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. How much over the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. CONNALLY. The bill as it passed the House and the Senate committee bill differ in all the surtaxes on incomes above $100,000. That would not mean a great amount, only about $30,000,000. The Senate committee bill, in other words, would raise about $30,000,000 annually more than would be raised under the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. President, I now want to call the attention of Members of the Senate, as briefly as I can, to some data and tables in connection with the increase in number of the income-tax payers with large incomes since the war.

It has been said in debate here repeatedly that if these high rates on incomes are put into effect, we shall dry up the sources of capital. An effort has been made to frighten us by the statement that tax-exempt securities will absorb all of the productive capital in case surtax rates are increased.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a table, which I shall ask to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NYE in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit A.)

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, from this table the following interesting and somewhat startling facts are made to appear. This is a table showing the number of income-tax payers with incomes from $250,000 up. In 1921 there were 84 taxpayers with incomes from $250,000 to $300,000. In 1922 the number had increased to 210. In 1923 there were 203. In 1924 there were 250. In 1925 there were 537. In 1926 there were 525. In 1927 there were 645. In 1928 there were 963, and in 1929, the last year for which figures are available, we find that there were 954 persons paying taxes on incomes between $250,000 and $300,000 a year.

Mr. President, this large and growing number of income-tax payers in the higher brackets refutes all of these claims that income taxes will either dry up the sources of revenue or drive the taxpayers into tax-exempt securities.

Let me call attention to the rates on incomes between $300,000 and $400,000. In 1921 in the United States there were 98 taxpayers with incomes from three to four hundred thousand dollars. In 1922, the very year when the rates were in effect, at the very time when Senators would have us believe incomes were driven into tax-exempt securities, or else were dried up, instead of there being 98, as there were in 1921, there were 205. Within a single year the number doubled. In 1923 we had 216. In 1924 there were 320. In 1925 they had increased to 562. In 1926 there were 576. In 1927 there were 755. In 1928 we had 1,181 income-tax payers with incomes from $300,000 to $400,000, when in 1921 we only had 98, an increase of 1,000 per cent. In 1929 the number was 1,023. Even during the panic, even during the crash on the stock exchange, the number decreased only from 1,181 to 1,023.

Let us see about the taxpayers with incomes from $400,000 to $500,000. In 1921 there were 64. In 1922 the number had increased to 104. In 1923 there were 111. In 1924 there were 137. In 1925 there were 330. In 1926 there were 316. In 1927 there were 386. In 1928 there were 575. In 1929 there were 618. The number of these large-income taxpayers, regardless of the depression and regardless of hard times, kept mounting and increasing along through the years.

Now I come to those with incomes of $500,000 to $750,000. In 1921 there were 46. In 1922 there were 122. In 1923 there were 103; in 1924, 192; in 1925, 340; in 1926, 146; in 1927, 173; in 1928, 298; and in 1929, 289.

I shall not worry the Senate with a detailed repetition of increases in the various brackets, but let me call attention to the income-tax payers with incomes of $1,000,000 to $1,500,000. In 1921 there were 12; in 1922, 37; in 1923, 39; 1924, 37; 1925, 104; 1926, 117, still increasing and growing; 1927, 138; 1928, 248, almost 100 per cent increase in a single year; and even in 1929, with the depression, there were 234 men in the United States paying taxes on incomes of between $1,000,000 and $1,500,000.

With incomes of $5,000,000 and over in 1921 we had one taxpayer in the United States. In 1922 there were 4, in 1923 there were 4, in 1924 there were 3, in 1925 there were 7, and in 1926 there were 14. In one year the income taxpayers with incomes of $5,000,000 and over had doubled. In 1927 we had 11. In 1928 there were 26, the number having more than doubled in a single year. In 1929, the year of the panic and depression, 38 individuals paid taxes on incomes of $5,000,000 and over.

The table presents some other interesting figures which I should like to submit to the Senate. There are statistics as to the net income of these classes. In 1924 the income of individuals with incomes of $250,000 and up was $553,000,000. The increase in a single year of those paying income taxes on such incomes in 1925 was from $553,667,070 to $1,236,463,280. In other words, in one year the income of men with incomes of $250,000 and up was doubled. What happened to individuals with incomes below that amount? Did the incomes of people in ordinary circumstances increase in the same ratio? In 1924 the incomes of all others with incomes from $1,000 to $250,000 were only $20,000,000,000. In 1925 it had declined to $16,000,000,000. The small income-tax payers' incomes had declined from $20,000,000,000 to $16,000,000,000 in the entire country, and yet the income-tax payers with incomes of $250,000 and up had more than doubled in amount during that same year.

In 1929 the total income of all men paying income taxes on incomes of $250,000 and up amounted to $2,770,276,000. From 1924 to 1929 the incomes of men above $250,000 increased four times, whereas all other income-tax payers had a decline in their incomes from $20,000,000,000 in 1924 to $17,000,000,000 in 1929.

Mr. President, these figures bring graphically to the mind of the man who studies them the fact that the great fortunes, no matter how we tax them, the number of people in the United States with great fortunes and enormous incomes increase inversely as the wealth and the income of the great masses decrease. So, Mr. President, I submit this amendment in the confident belief that it will produce something like $125,000,000 more revenue than is provided for by the Finance Committee bill and at the same time it will place that burden where it can best be borne. Under these rates, if an individual does not have a profit, if he does not receive an income, the tax gatherer will not lay his hand upon him. But if he has profits, if he has income, he can pay the tax without suffering and without sacrifice.

Mr. President, whenever we levy any kind of a tax we ought always to bear in mind not only the question of securing revenue, but we have the right to bear in mind the economic effect of the particular tax which we are considering. These income-tax rates not only have the effect of securing the necessary revenue, but they have an economic aspect of discouraging the building up of these gigantic fortunes, which all of us will admit do not contribute to the economic independence or the economic freedom of our people.

In this bill the Senate is going to be presented with the alternative of taxing productive sources in the form of incomes and profits or of taxing the necessities of the people. The bill carries a burdensome tax on bank checks. All will agree that a tax upon bank checks, however necessary it may be, if we decide to levy it, has a tendency to withdraw money from the banks. We know from past experience during the Spanish-American War that it is an irritating tax, a tax which the bankers and their customers all oppose.

The measure carries in addition increased rates on first-class postage. Every letter will bear a 50 per cent increase in the tariff which it will pay. Amusements, which are perhaps more necessary to the people with distracted minds and fevered imaginations during these depressing times than they would be during ordinary times, are to be taxed because the Secretary of the Treasury before our committee laid down the principle that a man who is able to go to a picture show has an income of some kind. While the Secretary of the Treasury was urging that admission taxes upon admissions as low as 10 cents should be levied on the theory that the man who is able to go to a picture show has an income, he was protesting against the income-tax amendment which is now before the Senate.

Mr. President, the necessity of the Congress is to secure $1,000,000,000 more revenue. The Finance Committee, after a month of deliberation, had searched out practically every available source of new revenue, and when it came to the end of its deliberations we still needed nearly $100,000,000 to balance the Budget. The committee turned to the amendment now pending and adopted it. It adopted it on the theory that these rates had been in effect in 1922, that the country had lived under them, that the country had paid them, and that at this time it could bear them again, that it could better bear them than it could bear a number of the other irritating and obnoxious excise taxes.

The act of 1922 approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, stopped at $200,000 and did not carry the surtaxes in graduated form any further. My amendment gradually increases those rates until a man with an income of $1,000,000 or more will pay 55 per cent on that portion of his income above $1,000,000. Lest some Senator become afraid that these rates will be oppressive, I want to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the average rate, not the extreme rate, but the average rate on the taxpayer's entire income is very much lower than would appear from hasty consideration.

In the case of taxpayers with incomes of $250,000 and up in 1920 they paid an average of 56.13 per cent; in 1921 they paid an average of 56.40 per cent; in 1922—and the figures for that year are comparable to those which would obtain under my amendment—men with incomes of $250,000 and up only paid 35.85 per cent of their income in taxes. So do not be frightened with the 55 per cent extreme surtax. That is levied only in the case of incomes above $1,000,000, and only on the excess. In the case of incomes below a million dollars the taxpayer pays rates beginning at a very small figure, so that the average rate is only 35 per cent of the entire income of all who pay income taxes on incomes above $250,000. In 1930 such a taxpayer paid only 16.63 per cent of his entire income. He paid about the same rates a corporation will pay under this bill. We propose to tax the corporation 14 per cent on its income. The men with tremendous incomes, running up into the millions, only paid in 1930 16.63 per cent of their entire income in the form of taxes. So do not be alarmed.

Mr. President, if the Senate wants a fruitful field from which revenue may be recruited I submit this amendment. The experts estimate that for the calendar year it will raise $158,000,000 more than will be raised by the bill as reported by the Senate committee, and that for the first six months of the fiscal year 1933 it will raise $123,000,000 more than will be raised by the bill reported by the Finance Committee. These rates are not oppressive when it is remembered that the average percentage of tax on income in all the higher brackets is only 35 per cent of the total income.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that I understood the last observation of the Senator. If I did, then it would be erroneous to assume that the tax in the highest bracket indicated on the chart to which the Senator has called attention would not be approximately $550,000, because that would be more than 35 per cent.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is explained to the Senator when I remind him that I was citing the average of the entire number and not the tax paid by particular individuals. What I said was that the total of all incomes above $250,000, all of them considered in one group, only paid 35 per cent of their total income. Of course, some of them pay less than 35 per cent, and some of them pay more than 35 per cent, as is indicated on the chart. This particular one [indicating on the chart] would pay 55 per cent, but the lower ones would pull the average down until the average tax of the taxpayer having an income of $250,000 would be 35 per cent of his total income.

Mr. KING. But, Mr. President, all income-tax payers whose income exceeds $1,000,000 would pay the five hundred and fifty and odd thousand dollars indicated on the chart.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will permit an interruption there.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Utah both are wrong there. The taxpayer would pay the rate of 55 per cent only on the excess of his income above a million dollars. That would mean that the average rate he paid on his income, of course, would be much less than that.

Mr. CONNALLY. But let me say to the Senator that there is a normal rate of 8 per cent on all incomes.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. So it happens that in the case of a man with an income of a million dollars, when he has counted his normal rates all the way up to the surtaxes which are gradually increased, he has to pay on a million dollars $550,000.

Mr. NORRIS. That is right.

Mr. CONNALLY. On income above that he would pay 55 per cent plus 8 per cent normal tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is right.

Mr. CONNALLY. So he would pay 63 per cent, instead of 55 per cent, on all over a million dollars of income.

Mr. NORRIS. But the point I want to make—and I think thing there is a misapprehension, or I would not have interrupted—is that $550,640 would be what he would pay on a million dollars of income; but his rate of taxation for his entire income on a percentage basis would be less than the percentage basis given, because all the way down the rate of taxation is less and the percentage he pays is less.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is not quite right, and I will show him why. I tried to point it out a while ago. As I said, one can not estimate that the whole tax is 55 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the only point I want to make.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well. But it happens that in the case of a man with an income of more than $1,000,000 he is paying not 55 per cent but 63 per cent, because there is added 8 per cent. In the case of an income of $1,000,000 it just so happens that the figures are $550,000, because the rate is about 62 per cent, but a man with an income of $30,000, for instance, would pay only 15 per cent of his income; a man with an income of $200,000 would only pay 43 per cent of his income. However, it happens that the man who has more than a $1,000,000 income does pay 55 per cent of that $1,000,000, but he is paying not on a 55 per cent basis but on a 63 per cent basis on all above a million, because added to the 55 per cent surtax is 8 per cent normal tax. Of course, the average rate is not ever as high as the highest surtax. The point the Senator from Nebraska was trying to make, and did make very clearly, is that the rate of tax on an income is never as high as the highest bracket.

Mr. NORRIS. That is right.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is the point and that is correct. But the highest bracket in this particular case instead of being 55 per cent is 63 per cent, and that explains the seeming error.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator from Utah was not in error in stating that the figures in the chart shown upon the wall, to which the Senator from Texas called our attention, which show a tax of $550,640 upon an income of $1,000,000 were wrong?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Utah is absolutely correct in the statement that the man with an income of $1,000,000, according to our estimates, must pay $550,000. However, the Senator from Utah asked me the question seemingly to contradict my statement that the average rate was only 35 per cent. What I said was that the average tax on all taxpayers who paid on incomes of $250,000 and above, all grouped together in one group, was 35 per cent of the income.

If the average is 35 per cent it necessarily follows that somebody is paying more than 35 per cent and that somebody else is paying less than 35 per cent, or else there could not be an average, of course, of 35 per cent of the income.

Mr. President, if there is any other question, I shall be glad to answer it. If not——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question or two.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be glad to answer the Senator, if I can.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment which the Senator is advocating was the one agreed to by the Finance Committee, was it not?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator from Nebraska that he is correct; it was.

Mr. NORRIS. What was the vote in the committee, if the Senator can give it?

Mr. CONNALLY. I can not tell the Senator exactly.

Mr. COUZENS. The vote was 11 to 7.

Mr. CONNALLY. I believe it was 11 to 7; at any rate, it was a decisive vote.

Mr. NORRIS. When did the committee experience a change of heart?

Mr. CONNALLY. The committee did not experience a change of heart; it experienced a change of head.

Mr. NORRIS. When did the committee experience "a change of head," and why?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Mills, the Secretary of the Treasury, came to the Finance Committee one morning in great agitation and perturbation and leveled an attack on what the committee had done the night before in adopting the schedule provided in this amendment. Mr. Mills came in just like a litigant who wants to compromise a suit and who is perfectly willing to compromise it if you will give him a judgment. Mr. Mills submitted a measure of compromise and asked the committee to accept his suggestion as a compromise bill. One of the conditions of his compromise was that the committee should reverse its action in adopting this amendment and go back to the provisions the Senate committee originally incorporated in the bill. Another feature of his compromise was that we should tax admissions from 10 cents up; that we should tax bank checks; and that we should put a tax on rubber.

Mr. NORRIS. I am wondering if that is the time when the newspapers announced that Mr. Mills had gone before the committee and lashed them right and left; that they had submitted to the chastisement and humbly and meekly had gone back to the place where he thought they ought to go.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator that newspapers, many of them, are just like individuals. Of course, the newspaper is a mechanical contrivance; but it is animated by men, and among some newspapers there are those who fawn before power and before influence just as many individuals do. So when Mr. Mills came before the Senate Finance Committee—I hope I am not revealing any secret——

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I do not think so.

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope I am not revealing any secret or violating any canons of ethics. The Senator from Utah is here, and if I do he will correct me.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the Senator from Texas will do so. Mr. Mills has no objection to the country knowing what his recommendations were.

Mr. CONNALLY. I say I do not want to violate any ethical considerations. I am a new member of the Senate Finance Committee and not thoroughly initiated into all its practices.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not been here very long, either, and I would not like to mislead the Senator and cause him to do something that was discourteous, of course, or violative of any rule. But I think the country ought to know the facts. Here is the great Finance Committee, which I can prove by members of the committee is the greatest committee of the Senate. They announced on a certain day—publicly announced—what they had agreed to. I am referring to the Senator's own amendment. After that announcement a good many of us who wanted to tax big incomes felt a sort of relief from the strain under which we had been suffering. The next day, however, we read how the members of the committee had been whipped and thrashed and driven around unmercifully and that they had meekly and humbly submitted to the direction of this great man who came in there. I want to know whether that is true or not?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall enlighten the Senator in so far as I am able to do so.

A good many motives were actuating the Finance Committee. Some of the members acted from one motive, probably, and some from another. Mr. Mills did come before the committee. He did strongly and vigorously insist that this income-tax amendment ought to come out of the bill. Like the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], he held up before the Finance Committee this bugaboo about driving all of the productive capital of the country into tax-exempt securities if we taxed the large incomes heavily through surtaxes. He said that it would have the effect of drying up the sources of capital investment, and that it would retard rather than bring back prosperity and business activity. Frankly, so far as I could see, he was more concerned in getting rid of this particular amendment than he was in anything else.

I think it is due the Senate committee to refute and deny the statements carried in many of the papers that the Senate committee was swept off its feet and was dazed and was thrown into chaos by Mr. Mills. That was not the effect at all. We had worked for a month. Many Senators were weary. The administration, through its Secretary of the Treasury, was insisting that the bill should be in this form; and most of the Senate committee members said, "Well, if the Treasury and the administration are going to insist on having the bill in this particular form, we are willing to let them take the bill. Nobody likes it. Nobody wants it. It is a makeshift and a hodgepodge of divergent views, born of the necessity of laying heavy taxes and getting the money." I think the committee as a whole took the view that if Mr. Mills wanted to father this bill, if the President over yonder in the White House wanted to father this bill and adopt it as an administration measure, the Senate committee was willing for the administration to take the responsibility.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator, however, before I yield to him that I, for one, was not willing to lay down my responsibility and shift that responsibility to the administration. I voted against what is known as the Mills compromise for that reason; but I attach no blame to the Senate committee. I think the members of the committee were actuated by the highest motives. I think they thought it was the best thing to do. I think they thought that if the Senate committee was to stand up for its own views and its own convictions it would be in a fight with the Treasury Department and with the administration; that delay might ensue and that the President—as seems to be his wont—would probably open up on the Congress, and particularly on the Senate, as delaying recovery, and try to array the country against the Congress and make the country think that the President was the only savior and the only hope for salvation of the country.

I think that kind of a mental attitude actuated the members of the Senate committee, and they said, "Well, Mr. Mills, if you have just got to have the bill this way, take it; and we reserve the right, when the bill gets into the Senate, to vote as we please."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, of course, I do not insinuate that any member of the committee was moved by anything but what he considered the highest of motives. I have not said anything and I do not intend to say anything that would intimate that; but I was anxious to know how many men were whipped into line, and I should like to have the Senator tell us what the vote was when they voted the next day after the committee had received that lecture from the Secretary of the Treasury. Was the Senator the only man on the committee who held out for his convictions?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no; there were four. I am not going to be led by the Senator from Nebraska into making any reflection upon the motives of the other members of the committee. I have already said to the Senator from Nebraska that I did not believe that any of the members of the committee—of the minority, especially—were whipped into line or were bulldozed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. NORRIS. Then they just thought his argument was good or was convincing?

Mr. CONNALLY. I must decline to interpret the motives of members of the committee. I am not a mind reader; I am not a soothsayer; and I refuse to let the Senator put into my mouth any imputation as against other members of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, if Mr. Mills convinced anyone that he was wrong, I think it was perfectly honorable and proper that he should, of course, vote his sentiments. It is no reflection on him to have done so.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to say, in justice to the committee, that there were several members of the committee who voted for my amendment the night before who did not really favor the amendment, but were driven to vote for it because of the necessity of getting $77,000,000, which was not then in the bill; and they thought that if we had to get it somewhere, my amendment was the best way of getting it. I think the members of the committee will bear me out in that statement.

The Senator from Nebraska, however, is a party man. When a Secretary of the Treasury of the administration, representing the President, comes into a committee room and insists to Senators in charge of legislation—the majority, the Republican majority—that such-and-such is the recommendation of the Treasury and of the White House, can not the Senator from Nebraska understand how that sort of an appeal would have a tremendous effect on party men?

Mr. NORRIS. Why, certainly I can understand that. I know that would have a wonderful effect on me, for instance, as the Senator says. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I did not mean that.

Mr. NORRIS. And I have not any doubt but that the party man would be justified in following his leader, right or wrong.

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not mean that with reference to the Senator, because he is not a member of the committee. I am talking about men who were on that committee, and who are party men, and who are administration followers. When the Secretary of the Treasury comes in and makes an appeal, and says, "The administration"—which means the President—"wants this bill, and wants it now," can not the Senator understand how that sort of an appeal would make Senators do things that perhaps they did not really want to do?

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator want me to answer his question?

Mr. CONNALLY. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I will not answer it.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is not necessary to answer it. The Senator knows that.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has asked me a question. Does he yield in order that I may answer it?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am glad to have the Senator answer it.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I do understand that. I will say "Yes." For instance, when there was a Democratic administration I have seen so many Democrats experience a change of heart from one evening, when a committee met, to the next morning, when they got instructions; and I am not surprised that that should happen in the Republican Party.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why, to be sure. The Senator from Texas was not trying to indicate that it would be any more influential with Republicans than with Democrats, because the same motives operate on men's minds pretty much in the same way all the time, regardless of the party to which they belong. I only suggested the particular case because that happened to be the fact for the moment; and, frankly, I think some of the minority voted as they did, as I suggested a little while ago, because they were glad to have the administration take the thing and assume responsibility for it. I think the Senator from Michigan will bear me out in that statement.

Mr. COUZENS. I can verify that; yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have a good witness, Mr. President. The Senator from Michigan is almost as close to the administration as the Senator from Nebraska. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not make any invidious comparison of that kind. I did not know that there was anybody who was in the same class when it came to being close to the administration.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, in conclusion I want to suggest that when it comes to levying taxes at any time, whether in normal times or in times of depression, the soundest method of securing revenue is to tax profits, to tax those who are making money, not those who are losing money. If Senators could have sat in the Finance Committee, as we did for two long weeks, and had heard the army of witnesses who appeared before that committee, they would have been astounded at the story of business disaster and business fear and business hardship which they related. Practically every excise tax that is imposed by this bill was denounced by those whom it affected as being ruinous to their business. They cited us statistics to show where they had sustained losses. They showed us where the imposition of these taxes would hinder, hamper, and in many cases ruin their business.

If we want business recovery to come about, if we want prosperity here again, we ought to place whatever taxes are levied by this bill where they can be most easily borne. Where is that? I submit that profits can more easily bear the burden of taxation than any other source whatever. If a man makes money, if he has an actual income, he can pay a tax without any hardship, without any suffering. His business will not be injured, because he already has an exemption. He is allowed his deductions, and he pays only on the portion over and above those deductions.

I submit the proposition—academic, it is true—that there is not a fairer or a more just tax under any flag than an income tax, a tax on profits, a tax on earnings. This particular measure undertakes to balance those rates in such a way as to spread them over the entire income tax-paying group. My amendment lowers the exemption to a thousand dollars in the case of unmarried men and $2,000 for married men, with this exception: If the income is less than $5,000, the exemption is $2,500. If the income is $5,000 or over, the married man has an exemption of only $2,000.

The amendment which I propose abolishes for the time being the earned-income allowance, because that was the case in 1922; and I undertook to revive the 1922 rates just as they were administered under the law at that time because of the experience of the Treasury, because of the well-known rulings and established customs of the Treasury in administering that law; and it will be much easier for the Treasury to administer this law under the same rules and regulations.

I increase the surtaxes, which did not go further than $200,000 in 1922. If Senators will read my amendment, they will see that I graduate those rates by 1 per cent and by 2 per cent until we reach a maximum of $1,000,000, and above that amount a rate of 55 per cent. By this amendment the normal rates are changed from those appearing in the bill to 4 and 8 per cent—4 per cent on the first $4,000 of income and 8 per cent on that above. That is fair, for this reason:

It is not just to increase the surtaxes at high rates unless we are also going to increase the rates on the small taxpayer. It is not fair and it is not just; and I do not want to be in the attitude here of simply baiting the rich. Under my amendment, the man with a net income of $3,000 will pay $20. Under the Senate committee amendment he will pay only $4. I am not afraid to increase the normal rates on the men of small income in this hour of necessity.

The man of small income owes a certain duty to his Government as well as the man with a large income. I want the small income-tax payer to know that I am not afraid to tax him so long as he knows that I am also taxing the man with a big income fairly and in a just relationship to the small income-tax payer. I should be ashamed to stand in my place on this floor and dare to tax the very rich at burdensome rates unless I were willing at the same time to say to the small taxpayer, "You must increase your tax." On the other hand, I should be unjust if I were willing to tax the small taxpayer at an increased rate unless I should also be willing to increase the rates on incomes of large dimensions.

Under the rates which I propose, because of the fact of carrying normal taxes of from 4 to 8 per cent on incomes of from ten to twenty thousand dollars, a large proportion of the revenue—not all of the revenue but much of the $158,000,000 which my amendment will produce—will be from incomes of ten, fifteen, twenty-five, to fifty thousand dollars. In taxing and increasing the rates on those incomes the rates are continued on up to the higher brackets, and the proper relationship is maintained between the small taxpayer and the taxpayer with the very large income.

Mr. President, I believe that the Senate, if it adopts this amendment, may be able to dispense with some of the noxious and odious and objectionable excise taxes carried in the bill. The administration, the Treasury, and all of the public press demand that the Budget be balanced.

Mr. President, the Senate has voted down the war-time rates offered by the Senator from Michigan; but when we get to these excise taxes, we are carrying the war-time rates. We are putting back upon the shoulders of the poor the rates which they bore in 1918, and more than the rates in some cases. In 1918 times were prosperous; labor was busy; labor was receiving higher wages than it had ever received before or has received since; and the taxes in the form of excises on automobiles and movies, postage, and other forms of excise taxes could be borne much more easily by the wage earners and by the farmers and by the men of small income in 1918 than the same taxes can be borne now.

On the other hand, if a man has an income, income taxes are easier to pay now than they were even in 1918, because the dollar of a man with a large income to-day is worth twice what the same dollar was worth in 1918.

Senators may say, "You must not put on these high income taxes now, because in this terrible time of depression you must not put on taxes which approximate the war rate." My answer is that if a man does not have the income, he does not have to pay the tax. The man who has had business losses, the man who has had his earnings wiped out by losses, does not have to pay. But if he has an income, he ought to pay, and he is more able to pay if he, in fact, has an income than he was in 1918, when his dollar was worth only 50 cents compared to what it is worth now.

Mr. President, in view of the statistics and tables which I have submitted to the Senate, the claim of Senators that the imposition of this sort of surtaxes dries up the sources of capital is shown absolutely to be groundless. From 1921 until this very hour the number of millionaires with tremendous incomes has been increasing year by year, year by year, and month by month.

Not alone is that true, but the proportion of the total income of men with incomes of $250,000 and more bore a larger ratio to the incomes of all other individuals in the United States in 1930 and 1929 than at any other time in the history of this Republic. That is going on year after year, and if we do not tax these productive fortunes, if we do not tax the sources of wealth which have within them profits, then the Senate is going to be driven to taxing the necessities of life. We are going to have to tax the men who are not making money, but are losing money. We are going to have to lay the burden upon the backs of the corporations which are not paying dividends, perhaps. We are going to have to lay the heavy load of taxes where it can illy and poorly be borne.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks a number of tables which I have submitted.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Added revenue for full year, $158,000,000.

Added revenue for fiscal year 1933, 3/5×$158,000,000 equals $93,000,000.

The above estimate of added revenue is on the basis of 1922 administrative provisions. The more strict provisions of the Finance Committee bill will add about $20,000,000 additional revenue, giving a total for the Connally plan of $113,000,000 more than the Finance Committee bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the address which has just been delivered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] has been singularly illuminating and instructive.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have been wondering during the progress of the debate, whence came the suggestion of a tax in a bill of the moment of the one that is before us, of 10 per cent upon 10-cent movies, and not only have I been wondering concerning it but those who live in the State from which I come, where that is one of the great industries of our territory, have been wondering as well. I have just learned from the Senator from Texas and from other Senators and from the events which have been described here.

I want to emulate the example of a distinguished Member of this body and answer, now, 11,753 telegrams which I have received from the State of California concerning the amusement tax, and I say to every movie house in the State of California, to every movie actor in Hollywood, to every artist and employee there, and to every individual who has protested against this 10 per cent tax upon a 10-cent movie, "This tax came from the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States, and was levied in this bill, so far as it could be levied—according to the statements which have just been made in this body—by the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States." Let all these Californians who have been kind enough to wire me in such devastating tones regarding that amusement tax understand just exactly where that tax came from and who it was put it into this tax bill.

I am unable to understand, too, how anyone, when we reach that particular part of this measure, will be able, if he votes against the amendment that is proposed, and has voted against the amendment which has been presented by the Senator from Michigan, can vote to eliminate that amusement tax. I am well aware that there are some distinguished gentlemen in this body; I know some of them, from conversations with them, who are simply awaiting the opportunity to demonstrate conclusively what a wretched assault upon a poor man's amusement a 10 per cent tax upon 10-cent movies is in a great tax bill.

I watched the votes of some of those gentlemen on the Couzens amendment. I will be glad to watch them similarly upon the amendment of the Senator from Texas; and I want them to explain, when they say that the great desideratum of every man on the face of the earth now is to balance the Budget without delay, how they can vote to eliminate an amusement tax which would bring seventy-odd millions of dollars into the Treasury of the United States, and fail to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Michigan or the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to point out to the Senator that I think the Senator from Texas was a little too courteous. He has the southern gentleman's attitude; he treated the Secretary of the Treasury very gently. We had all admission taxes limited to 46 cents in the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. Forty-five cents.

Mr. COUZENS. I think it was 46 cents.

Mr. CONNALLY. It was 46 cents in the bill as it passed the House, and we made it 45.

Mr. COUZENS. Very well, 45 cents. That was all fixed. I think the committee was unanimous. I do not recall any attempt in the committee to cut it any lower than that. Then we adopted Senator CONNALLY'S proposal for the income-tax rate he is now proposing, the 1922 rate. We adopted his amendment, as I remember, by a vote of 11 to 7. Then the hurry call went in. Then the Treasury was contacted, and the Secretary of the Treasury came to the committee on a Friday morning and browbeat the committee into cutting down the income taxes, and adding $70,000,000 to admission taxes.

Mr. LONG. O Mr. President, surely the Senator does not mean that the Senate was browbeaten into that?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. If it will not be an interruption, I want to call a witness, the Senator from Michigan, to the colloquy which took place in the committee about the very matter which the Senator from California is now discussing. The question was asked of the Secretary of the Treasury whether he favored taxing admissions down to 10-cent admissions, and he said that any man who could go to a picture show had some sort of an income. Is that correct?

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator will have to excuse me. I was presiding at a meeting of the Committee on Interstate Commerce on the morning when Secretary Mills appeared before the Finance Committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. So the suggestion emanated from the Secretary of the Treasury, speaking for the President of the United States, and it was the Secretary of the Treasury, speaking for the President of the United States, who gave us this glorious tax of 10 per cent upon a 10-cent movie!

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I point out another very significant thing. Included in the Secretary's proposal was a 5-cent import tax on rubber, estimated to bring in $53,000,000. That proposal was put over on the Secretary, I think. I do not believe he was conscious of the implications of it.

There were several large tire companies which had a year and a half's supply of rubber on hand. They went to the Secretary and proposed that an import tax of 5 cents on rubber would be a good tax. So that was put into the bill as reported to the Senate. Then it was discovered that that would raise the inventory value of the rubber these tire companies had on hand by $53,000,000, because they would not need to import any rubber bearing an import tax of 5 cents a pound. Of course, the committee had more sense than to adopt that, even though it was tried on us. The committee saw that the Government would not only not get any revenue from such a tax but that it would add to the inventory of the tire companies some $53,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. In all that I say I do not reflect, of course, upon the committee. I realize that men may, after mature deliberation of 2 weeks, 3 weeks, or 4 weeks, or a lifetime, even, reach certain conclusions, that they may embody them, even, in a written tax bill, in which, as here, the amendment of the Senator from Texas was written practically into the measure that was to be presented to the Senate by the Finance Committee. I can understand how, when the gigantic intellects of men have thus been exercised for periods of weeks or even months, it would be possible for one superman to come before them and, in the twinkling of an eye, convince them how erroneous was their judgment and how useless had been their long labors.

I read the following day concerning the proceedings. I resented what was said in the press of the country concerning the Finance Committee. Indeed, I stood upon the floor of the Senate on the very day practically that it occurred and I resented the statement made by a member of the Finance Committee that what this country needed was another Mussolini, and in my humble way and with my poor command of language I endeavored to dissent from that opinion then expressed. I did not know then what had transpired in the Finance Committee, and I complimented it upon the labor that it had done, and expressed my belief that the Finance Committee would ultimately do justice to the people of the country, all the people of the country, not only justice unto those who go to a 10-cent movie, but justice, too, to those who have incomes of $1,000,000, $2,000,000, $3,000,000, $5,000,000, or $10,000,000, as the case may be, for I can not conceive that in a time of stress like this we will divide our energies, with all the abilities that God gave us and these magnificent heads of ours crammed as they are with gray cells that enable us to act with that peculiar facility which is always, of course, characteristic of a Senator.

I believe that we will be able before we finish with this bill to do justice to every class, to all peoples, to those who have a dime in their pockets to spend for themselves and their children in a movie and to those who have incomes of $1,000,000, $2,000,000, $3,000,000, $4,000,000, or $5,000,000. With this abiding confidence that I have in the Finance Committee and in any part of the Senate, the legislative branch of this Government, whether there be a bi-partisan alliance or whether there be not, I am sure that the Senate will ultimately do its fullest justice to all the people of this land.

Now, immediately after the transaction that occurred in the Finance Committee, I read the various reports, and I am an omnivorous reader of newspapers notwithstanding that I read some very unpleasant things at times. I read the report of what had happened, and on behalf of the Finance Committee I bitterly resented those reports. To me it was an outrageous thing that when the Finance Committee had worked so hard and done its duty so well that it should be assailed in practically every newspaper of the administration in this land as being taken by the back of the neck and twisted around on an atrocity of a bill and made to undo its work and respond to an arrogant command. I take the least offensive of these articles in order that Senators may see how all over the Nation the particular incident ran. This is from the New York Herald Tribune and it is dated May 6 of this year:

Under the spur of the alternate appeal and attack of Ogden L. Mills, Secretary of the Treasury, and the evidences of the country's keen dissatisfaction with the delays and objectionable novelties in its fluctuating program, the Senate Finance Committee largely rewrote and then put the finishing touches to-day on a tax bill which promptly received administration indorsement.

Remember, "these novelties in the fluctuating program of the Finance Committee" are thus described and they, of course, were eliminated, according to this article, by the wise advice and the marvelous prescience of the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, and yet we have just learned here that these "novelties in its fluctuating program" were then and there adopted at his instance and at the instance of the President of the United States.

The article proceeds:

After reversing itself at the urgent behest of Secretary Mills, the committee lowered the high income-tax rates approved yesterday—

That is the Connally amendment—and cut or added throughout the list of its tentative items, in the process of eliminating an array of small excise taxes projected by the House. The result was a measure estimated to raise $1,010,000,000 in new revenue for the Treasury in the next fiscal year. The committee counts also upon $231,000,000 in Government economies to complete the balancing of the Budget.

With unwonted restraint, the chastened committee, in executive session, heard Mr. Mills condemn the tentative bill of yesterday in the strongest terms. He objected to the whole form of the measure and declared it to be discouraging to the country and unsettling for business. Having listened to a virtual reading of the "riot act," the committee promptly got into action and accepted a compromise program which was promised the stamp of Treasury approval.

Mr. President, I read that article not because I believe it, but in order to indicate what the action taken by the Finance Committee upon the Connally amendment was as given by the newspapers of the country, and to illustrate the newspaper comment in regard to that amendment and the action of the committee.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to be just to the Finance Committee and say to the Senator with reference to the newspaper report that the meeting of the committee was executive. The impression which the newspapers got was from the Secretary of the Treasury himself or from some spokesman of the committee who reported to the newspapers what took place in the committee meeting. I do not mean that the meeting was executive in that the proceedings were not to be given out, but I mean there were no newspaper men present when the Secretary appeared before the committee. Either the Secretary of the Treasury told the newspapers what he said to the committee or some member of the committee had to admit to the press that they had become frightened and then surrendered.

Mr. JOHNSON. The explanation of the Senator, if it is intended as an explanation, is a little worse than the accusation. After all, it makes little difference what the newspaper published. It makes little difference how anyone should characterize it. The fact is the deed was done. That fact is what interests me. That is the thing that stands out. Why its extraordinary importance at this time? I listened to at least two arguments upon the floor of the Senate to-day about the glorious work of the Finance Committee, how it had expended its time and its labors, its brain activity and the like, and how the provisions of this bill ought to be carried through by the Senate. I heard arguments of this sort this morning about standing by the committee, and I recognize that ordinarily the idea is that if the committee has worked hard and presented a measure, we should endeavor to stand by the committee when the measure comes upon the floor.

But in this instance, sir, we are really standing by the committee in its 2 or 3 or 4 weeks' work by standing by the Connally amendment, because it was adopted by the committee by a vote of 11 to 7, and, after being written in the bill, on the following day, in 15 seconds after the visit of the Secretary of the Treasury, apparently it was eliminated with but 4 dissenting votes. So the argument that was made rather eloquently to-day by two distinguished gentleman about standing by the committee has no weight in this instance and we stand by the committee when we stand by the Senator from Texas in the amendment which he has presented.

I sought to answer the 11,753 telegrams which had come to me from California upon the item relating to amusements and an amusement tax. I answer now for a brief three minutes the other telegrams, 28,764 in number, that have come to me upon other subjects from the State of California on the specific taxes that are mentioned in this bill.

There is to be raised by this bill $1,000,000,000 in round numbers for the purpose of meeting a Treasury deficit. Remember, every man of you back in the State from which I hail and in which I was born, remember every one of you why you are paying $1,000,000,000 to-day in taxes, taxes that rack you and take from you the economic security which you believed was yours. You are paying it, first, because last year $250,000,000 was yielded to Europe which Europe was about to pay to us. One-fourth of the amount that is raised by this bill we gave to Europe last year when Europe was ready to pay it to us, and we did it upon a dud and upon a pretense that never was borne out either in what was said unto the Members of the Congress of the United States or to the countries of Europe themselves.

First, it was asserted to our people and to our Congressmen in wires that they would give a moratorium to the countries that owed us abroad and these countries would grant a like moratorium to Germany. Acting upon that information conveyed to them by telegrams dispatched throughout the country, it was but natural that Members of the Senate and Members of the House responded, and responded in the affirmative to the request of the President of the United States. When we came to grant the moratorium, never forget that the unconditional reparations that were demanded by France from Germany were still demanded and were paid to France. Remember that! The predicate that was given to us in our dispatches concerning the moratorium was a predicate without foundation and which ultimately was not borne out by the subsequent events. Remember, too, that the money that Germany paid subsequently in December, $250,000,000, was paid by Germany to international bankers upon short-time credits, and it was so testified in Switzerland when the financiers met there.

So remember, you people in California who come complaining about the taxes now being levied upon you, one-fourth of the amount you are paying because you did not receive what was your due last year, $250,000,000, and remember, too, that it is asserted that next month or later in the year another moratorium of $270,000,000, because of the moratorium which we granted in December last, will be doubtless accorded, and that by virtue of the action we took last year the $270,000,000 due to us this year in all probability never will be paid. And the aggregate of these two sums is half of this extraordinary sum of $1,000,000,000 that we are to pay under this tax bill. Every dollar given Europe is now being paid by American taxpayers.

Keep in mind, people back in California who are paying the piper now, why you are paying the piper, and you can understand it by following recent events and by reading in most cursory and most casual fashion the events that are transpiring to-day.

The amendment of the Senator from Texas is fair, because it will enable us to eliminate some of the obnoxious nuisance taxes that are in this bill. I favored the amendment of the Senator from Michigan because I believed it would enable us to eliminate all of those obnoxious taxes and because I believed it to be in this time of distress an entirely fair mode of levying taxes. I favor the amendment now before us because it partially does what the amendment of the Senator from Michigan wholly did and because, as well, it is a just and equal and equitable mode of levying taxation.

Taxation, as has been repeatedly said here to-day, is after all a horrid thing. No man likes to pay taxes; much less does anyone who has the power desire to levy taxes. It is a painful thing from the standpoint of him who levies and much more painful from the standpoint of him who pays. So it is an unpleasant duty that devolves upon us in this particular conjuncture of our affairs, but a duty that must be met. The way in which we must meet it is the way that seems to each of us most just, most fair, and most equitable; and the fairest and justest and most equitable fashion in which we can levy these taxes and collect them and have the revenue that is necessary for the disposition of the Government during the coming fiscal year is first by the amendment presented by the Senator from Michigan, and, secondly, in a measure, by the amendment presented by the Senator from Texas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the figures which were quoted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] were based upon the year 1929. I am sure that the conditions existing in the country to-day will not bring the amount of revenue indicated by the chart on the wall. For instance, in the year 1929 the net income shown by the tax returns filed amounted to $24,794,609,739. In 1930 the net income, as shown by the returns filed in that year under the same identical law as prevailed in 1929, was only $17,220,753,620. There was thus, Mr. President, a reduction in net incomes from $24,000,000,000 to $17,000,000,000 in that one year, and business has not increased since 1930. It is less to-day than it was in 1930. Again, Mr. President——

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the Senator referred to the figures on the chart. The chart which has been put up on the wall does not indicate any figures as to what revenue will be received.

Mr. SMOOT. I am speaking now of the statement made by the Senator from Texas that there was no necessity for the figures which were presented by the committee.

Mr. COUZENS. But the Senator in his statement said that the amount indicated on the chart would not be realized, whereas there is no estimate on any of the charts as to the revenues that will be received.

Mr. SMOOT. Take the second chart on the wall and see what the figures are.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator refer to this one [indicating].

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. There it gives the amount for each bracket and not for the entire incomes. There are no estimates of total receipts based on the rates shown by the chart.

Mr. SMOOT. But I am calling attention to the difference there would be in the receipts as claimed compared with the actual receipts which would be received according to the rates indicated on the chart.

Mr. COUZENS. But there are no receipts stated on the chart.

Mr. SMOOT. What I am referring to is the basis of the receipts, namely, net income. I am calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that under the existing rates in 1929 the income-tax returns filed showed a net income of over $24,000,000,000, whereas the next year, 1930, the net income as shown by the returns dropped to $17,220,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator to what he is referring?

Mr. SMOOT. I am referring to the basis on which the income taxes were paid as reported by the Treasury Department.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator means, I understand, the total income shown by the returns filed?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the total net income for both years, and from such net income, of course, the taxes are collected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator did not refer, then, to the total taxes collected.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I referred to the net income——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Subject to taxation.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all. Beginning with the lowest bracket and going up to the highest.

Mr. President, under the rates as proposed by the Finance Committee in the bill reported by it, on a $3,000 net income there would be on the average a tax of $4 paid. Under the Connally amendment the tax paid would be $20. That, of course, is on a net income of $3,000.

In the next bracket, $5,000, under the Connally amendment the tax would be $100, while under the rate proposed in the bill reported by the committee it would be $56.

So, Mr. President, it can be seen that under the Connally amendment we would collect the greatest amount of revenue from the men who pay taxes on incomes of from $3,000 to $5,000 and $10,000. In the case of an income of $10,000, under the Connally amendment the tax would be $520, while under the rate provided by the bill reported by the committee it would be $295.

That is what the Connally amendment means. If that is what the Senate wants, of course it will vote for the Connally amendment.

Under the Connally amendment the highest rate on an income of $1,000,000 would be $571,140. Under the Senate committee amendment it will be noticed that the tax would be $492,940; in other words, there is not the difference in the higher brackets between the rates in the Connally amendment and those proposed by the Finance Committee; the principal difference is in the case of the lower brackets.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. LONG. In any event the Connally amendment will provide more revenue for the Government than any similar schedule in the Finance Committee bill, will it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but it will come from the men who make between three and five thousand dollars up to $10,000.

Mr. LONG. Is the Senator interested in excepting them from the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. No proposal under consideration excepts them; but the Finance Committee bill taxes a man with a $3,000 income $4, while the Connally amendment would impose a tax upon him of $20. If a man has an income of $5,000, the bill as reported by the Finance Committee would tax him $56, while the Connally amendment would tax him $100.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. COUZENS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield first to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Utah if what he has stated is his objection to the Connally amendment, how would it suit the Senator if we should eliminate the brackets covering incomes of $3,000 and $5,000 and leave them just as they are left in the bill as reported from the Finance Committee? In other words, change the Connally amendment so that on the $3,000 income the tax would be $4, just as it is fixed by the bill as reported by the Finance Committee, and in the $5,000 bracket make the tax $56 instead of $100, as provided by the Connally amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. If that should be done, we would not raise sufficient revenue to meet the expenses of the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably not; but if the Senator is basing his objection to the Connally amendment on the ground he has stated, let us change the Connally amendment and let the tax imposed in those two brackets be just the same as provided in the Connally amendment. We shall not get so much money, it is true, but it would still produce more money than the committee proposition; it would levy the higher tax on the big incomes and relieve the little fellows, just as the Senator from Utah seems to desire to do.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Nebraska is mistaken as to the receipts, and that is what we are figuring on securing.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. Let the Senator, if he can, call my attention to a single bracket on the table that he holds in his hand where the Connally amendment would not produce more revenue on the same income than would the committee amendment. Will the Senator from Utah call my attention to one such case?

Mr. SMOOT. Where the Connally amendment would not produce more revenue?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it would produce more all along the line.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, what I now say is, if we desire to obtain the revenue, and in order to satisfy the Senator who is interested in the little fellow who only has the small income, let us eliminate from the Connally amendment the $3,000 and $5,000 brackets, let the Connally amendment be just the same as provided in the committee amendment for those two brackets, and commence the increased rates on the $10,000 bracket, and so on up, letting the little fellow out. Would the Senator from Utah favor that?

Mr. SMOOT. I could not favor it until I knew just exactly what amount of revenue would be involved.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has his own table which shows exactly those figures.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. NORRIS. It is a mathematical certainty that with a net income of $10,000 the bill as reported by the Finance Committee would require the taxpayer to pay $295, while the Connally amendment would require a taxpayer having the same income to pay $520, and so on all the way through.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course, that is true merely as to one taxpayer. I do not know how many taxpayers there are to-day who come within these brackets.

Mr. NORRIS. It would make no difference whether there should be one or whether there should be a million; every one of them would be treated just alike. All through the brackets it is just the same. Now if the Senator is really in earnest, and wants to relieve the small taxpayer, why does he not accept that kind of a suggestion?

Mr. SMOOT. Because I can not tell how many taxpayers would fall within the $10,000 bracket.

Mr. NORRIS. How did the Senator know when he prepared his committee amendment how many would fall within the bracket if he does not know now?

Mr. SMOOT. We knew from the report of the Treasury Department, which I have not with me, but it can be obtained.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. The number of taxpayers who had a $10,000 income last year would not be the same number who have a $10,000 income this year.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. NORRIS. But if a taxpayer had a $10,000 income this year, we would know just exactly what he would have to pay to a penny.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; there is no question about that.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The estimates show that those with incomes of from $10,000 to $25,000 would, under the Senate committee bill, pay $80,400,000, while under my amendment they would pay $119,000,000; so in that one bracket my amendment would produce $39,000,000 more revenue than would the House bill.

The Senator from Utah complains that the taxpayer with a net income of $3,000, under my amendment, would pay $20, while the same taxpayer under the Senate committee bill would pay only $4, and yet in England the taxable income starts at $800, with a rate of 12½ per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and it runs up to about eighty-odd per cent before they get through with the tax.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Utah is anxious to raise money for the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. We have got to get it.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Utah stands on this floor and, almost with the spirit of Al Capone, says we have got to have the money. He objects to the amendment which I offered, which taxes a man with a $3,000 income $20, when a taxpayer with a similar income in England, instead of paying $20, pays $303.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be; I have not any doubt about it, for I have examined the figures.

For instance, the income tax in England runs up to about 87 per cent.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator that I am not going to appear on this floor advocating taxing the big incomes without taxing the little incomes, too. My amendment starts down at the bottom, where the great number of incomes are. It does not tax them oppressively. It increases the rate; and then, after it taxes the little man, it maintains a fair relation toward the big one, and carries those rates right on through up to the top rate of 55 per cent.

I do not believe the Senator from Utah is doing himself or the committee any credit in opposing these rates on the ground that they are taxing the little man. That is not the reason.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the Senator's provision, one-fifth of the increase will be derived from taxpayers having incomes of $5,000 and under.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why, certainly; and the reason is that there is where the bulk of the incomes are.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Utah would tax moving-picture shows; and instead of taxing a small percentage, as my amendment does, he would tax everybody rather than to tax a few of these people who are able to pay and can pay a reasonable tax.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not tax admissions if it were not absolutely necessary to raise the money.

Mr. CONNALLY. May I interrupt the Senator further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah further yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. The normal rates of 4 and 8 per cent which the Senator from Utah is now inveighing against and opposing, as contained in my amendment, were originally urged by the Secretary of the Treasury. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not recall whether they were urged by the Secretary of the Treasury or not.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Secretary of the Treasury—Mr. Mills—urged normal rates of 4 and 8 per cent, and those are the rates which produce the $20 tax on the $3,000 income. How can the Senator now oppose what the Secretary of the Treasury advocated?

Mr. SMOOT. I am calling the attention of the Senate to the facts as they exist, and where the money will come from under the Senator's amendment. That is all I am doing; and I think the Senator will admit that that is the fact.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is the fact, of course. If you have a million incomes at a dollar a head you are going to get more money than if you have one income at $100,000.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course. That is why the bulk of the revenue comes from small incomes—because there are so many more of them, just as the Senator's tax of 10 cents on movies will get much more money; because while it is only 10 cents a head, there are millions upon millions of heads.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the Senator's amendment. It was suggested by the Treasury; and I want to say to the Senator that the committee thought that was as easy a way of collecting money as could be found.

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] speaks about the President sending Secretary Mills up to the committee. I do not think the President had a single, solitary word to say about it. I called the matter to the Secretary's attention at the close of our meeting upon that day. I gave to the press every day a statement of just exactly what the committee did. Anything that appeared in the papers other than the mere statement of the action taken by the committee comes from the writer of the article. Ever since I have been chairman of the Finance Committee upon all occasions after the meetings were over I have told the newspaper representatives who were there just exactly what took place.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is true, Mr. President. I want to bear witness to what the Senator says.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows as well as I know that the plain statement of the truth as given to the newspaper men has not always appeared in the papers.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I want to say, so far as the Senator from Utah is concerned, that I absolve myself from any implication that the Senator from Utah has done anything with respect to these reports except what was absolutely accurate and true, because I think that is the fact. I have the highest respect for the Senator from Utah and his views. Whenever I disagree with the Senator from Utah it is with reference to his views and not with reference to his personal conduct.

Mr. SMOOT. In relation to the tax on rubber of which the Senator speaks, I want to say that the first suggestion that Secretary Mills made was for a tax of 5 cents per pound. That was his suggestion upon the day he came up to the committee.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. LONG. How was it that the committee reversed itself? As I understood—I was not in the city at the time—they voted 11 to 7 for a 55 per cent income tax, as recommended by the Senator from Texas. That was one evening, was it not?

Mr. SMOOT. One day.

Mr. LONG. One afternoon or one night. About how long had they been laboring with this bill at the time they decided to write that into the law, and did write it into the law?

Mr. SMOOT. About three weeks, I should say.

Mr. LONG. How long did it take the committee to change its mind when Mr. Mills came down there?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] were here, I would rather have him state exactly the history of the matter.

Mr. LONG. I was wondering if it was 12 hours or 40 hours. How many hours did it take the Secretary of the Treasury to change the committee's mind?

Mr. COUZENS. Twenty minutes.

Mr. LONG. Twenty minutes? I was thinking it might have been a shorter time than that. I beg the Senator's pardon. My imputation does not lie.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GEORGE. I hope the Senator will yield to me right there, because I desire to make a statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I will.

Mr. GEORGE. I think I can make the statement with good grace, because it has long been obvious to me that I should not be able to support this bill with the unconscionable tariff rates on copper, on oil, on coal, and on lumber that were included in a tax bill in which they have no place at all.

With reference to the rates, however, and wholly aside from what any newspaper may have said about them, the committee diligently worked upon rates in this bill and finally wrote a schedule of rates after about three weeks' work. Then, Friday before we put the bill in final shape it became necessary to raise some additional revenue if certain excise taxes were thrown out, as it appeared they would be eliminated from the bill.

We then adopted the so-called Connally amendment, which incorporated the 1922 rates. We had not adopted the Connally amendment for three weeks, until the last day on which we gave consideration to the bill. Then, the following morning, Mr. Mills came before the committee at the request of members of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to come to that, Mr. President.

Mr. GEORGE. But if the Senator will indulge me——

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. It is little less than ridiculous for Members of the Senate to stand upon this floor and intimate that the Secretary of the Treasury or anybody else came before the committee, not at the committee's request, and simply compelled the committee to take any view. Not only have I stated the exact facts thus far, but Mr. Mills did not suggest the rates that are in this bill. The Secretary of the Treasury came before the committee and suggested 4 and 8 per cent normal, just as the Senator from Texas is now suggesting; the only difference between his suggestion and that now made by the Senator from Texas being that the Senator from Texas extends the rates at the top up to $1,000,000 or $2,000,000.

That was the suggestion made by the Secretary; that is, the 4 and 8 per cent normal. The committee went back to the original schedule, the schedule by which we had been standing from the first day until Friday before we put the bill in final form Saturday, and accepted the normal rates of 3, 6, and 9 per cent against the proposal made by the Secretary of 4 and 8 per cent, and applied the maximum surtax at 45 per cent rather than 55 per cent, I believe, or 50 per cent, as proposed by the distinguished Senator from Texas; and he has quite correctly called attention to the fact that the suggestion made by Mr. Mills was 4 and 8 per cent, just as he himself is proposing in his amendment here.

I want to be perfectly fair to Mr. Mills. I have never imagined for a moment that a man of sensibility would have given any authority whatever for the perfectly asinine statements that were carried by the press on the following day. I have never charged them to Mr. Mills, and, of course, Mr. Mills did not make any such suggestions. Where the press got its information or misinformation I do not know; but Mr. Mills came before the committee particularly pointing out some administrative provisions in the bill. He particularly objected to the provision which imposed an additional penalty on consolidated returns, and which denied taxpayers the right to take security losses—that is, losses sustained in one year—as it was written in the House bill and as we had substantially agreed to take it, as I recall. We agreed upon a compromise upon that point.

Mr. Mills, be it said, also suggested the entire elimination of a number of these offensive excise taxes, and they were eliminated; but Mr. Mills's whole attitude before the committee was that from a careful study of every vote taken by the committee it was apparent that the Treasury could approve 90 per cent of what the committee had already done, but there was substantially 10 per cent with which the Treasury found itself in disagreement and believed that it had some helpful suggestions to make.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator has not mentioned the fact that the Secretary brought with him a typewritten statement of the 10-cent-admissions tax and those other taxes which were later substituted, after he appeared before the committee.

Mr. GEORGE. He did. The Secretary did suggest two or three other excise taxes that we had not put in the bill; but he also suggested the elimination of a number of excise taxes that we had in the bill—for instance, a tax on matches, a tax on soap, a tax on cosmetics, and various taxes.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true.

Mr. GEORGE. He did suggest the tax on 10-cent admissions, whereas we had agreed upon a schedule of 45 cents minimum upon admissions.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. REED. My recollection, if the Senator will permit me, was that the Secretary stated two alternatives and expressed no preference between them. One was a proposed increase in the tax on tobacco products, and the other was this reduction in the minimum of admissions. Is that recollection correct?

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is quite right on that. We took one or two votes on the tobacco matter.

Mr. COUZENS. I think the Senator has made an error, because I think he suggested either the tobacco tax or the rubber tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; or the automobile tax—either one.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; and I remember that I made the motion for the tobacco tax.

Mr. REED. He offered an alternative between tobacco and something else; but I think I was wrong.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the Senator takes his seat I thought he was going to tell us how it came about that the committee reduced the maximum rate from 55 per cent to 45 per cent, and upon what consideration, after it had agreed upon 55 per cent as the maximum.

Mr. SMOOT. In what rate, Mr. President? Does the Senator mean on incomes?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As I gather, at the time of the Secretary's last visit with the committee it had been agreed that the normal rates were to be 4 and 8 per cent and the maximum surtax rate was to be 55 per cent.

Mr. GEORGE. Fifty or fifty-five; I have forgotten how the amendment reads.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then the change was made in the normal tax from 4 and 8 to 3, 6, and 9, and the maximum rate was changed to 45.

Mr. GEORGE. We went back to the bill as we had worked it out before we had accepted the Connally amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What was the consideration, and upon whose motion was that change made?

Mr. GEORGE. The Secretary suggested that we take 4 and 8, rather than the committee bill as changed by the Conally amendment; and then, having suggested certain changes in the excise taxes, the special taxes, the elimination of some and the addition of others, the majority of the committee seemed to be agreed that the original committee bill, applying the original committee rates, was the better bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is, because of additional revenue that was to be secured by these special taxes?

Mr. GEORGE. Certain additional excises were added; for instance, an import tax on rubber was added, and we were first informed that it would produce $53,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So to that extent it was an exchange of consumption taxes for an increased income tax?

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator will permit me to state why I was in favor of that, it was because I am certain that the higher rates on large incomes, million-dollar incomes and over, are going to be almost entirely fruitless. I am sure that so far as the high brackets are concerned we have gotten all out of them we can get out of them under the bill we have adopted, if we get additional income out of the income provision. The Senator from Texas and the Senator from Michigan are both quite right.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That may be quite right, but apparently the day before at least, the committee had concluded that it was wise to keep the rate at 55.

Mr. GEORGE. No; we had concluded to accept the Connally amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. GEORGE. Because it would raise about a hundred million dollars additional revenue that we needed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That amendment fixed the highest excess rate at 55.

Mr. GEORGE. But it taxed the lower incomes at 4 and 8 also. I beg the pardon of the Senator from Utah for consuming so much of the time, but I wanted to make the statement, because I do not know that I shall take occasion to discuss the bill further.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] had a proposition worked out in detail, and I suppose every member of the committee had one of the Senator's plans. Most of the suggestions of the Senator from Mississippi were contained in the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury. There were some additions on the part of the Secretary, but I have checked them up, item by item, and the provisions that would raise the largest amount of money were in the suggestion made by the Senator from Mississippi.

The Senator from Georgia has stated the history of it just as I understand it.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Is it not a fact that the committee traded $125,000,000 of income taxes for a tax on rubber and a raise in the rate on automobiles? In other words, they traded $125,000,000 of income taxes for consumption taxes?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I would not want to say that the committee "traded," because the only trading I saw at all going on was over the tariff items on oil and copper and other things.

Mr. COUZENS. It may not have been trading——

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think there was any trading so far as the general committee was concerned.

Mr. COUZENS. We will call it "substituting," if the Senator likes that term better.

Mr. GEORGE. I did not see any trading except on oil and copper and other items of that character.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not know to whom the Senator is referring; I did not trade on any of them.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not referring to anyone, of course, as trading; the Senator knows that.

Mr. COUZENS. I am trying to say that Mr. Mills got us to take $125,000,000 off the income-tax rates and put the amount back on consumption taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know that it is necessary for me to say anything further. The Senate understands thoroughly what the Senator's amendment means, and what revenue, perhaps, will be raised from it. That, of course, can be estimated, just the same as any other estimate is made based upon the business which exists to-day. I think that the rates as suggested by the committee, taking everything into consideration, are what the Senate ought to agree to. It is entirely in the hands of the Senate in voting on the amendment.

I know the Senator from Texas has acted in this matter in the best of faith, and I recognize, too, that his amendment will bring more revenue, perhaps $100,000,000 more revenue, than the rates provided for in the Senate committee bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator from Utah admits that my amendment would bring in $100,000,000 more than the Senate committee rates, does it not follow that the Senate would be saved the necessity of putting $100,000,000 in the form of excise taxes? Is not that true?

Mr. SMOOT. We can make reductions.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; make reductions on consumption taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. Whatever tax the Senate decides to decrease.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I neglected to say that I voted for the Connally amendment in the committee. I voted for it because I thought it was a better amendment, everything considered. I thought it would give us a leeway, so that we might eliminate certain other of the objectionable excise taxes, and I concede that the amendment has certain virtues at the present time.

I have not thought that it is worth while going above a maximum income rate of 45 plus 9, which is 54 per cent on a million-dollar income. We could not hope to fool the country about it, because we are not going to get any substantial revenue from that bracket, there is no use trying to fool the country. But I thought that the Senator's amendment, because it would raise more revenue, and because it would apply in a lower bracket a higher normal tax, was a better provision in some respects than the provision presented by the committee.

I have no idea that the Senator from Texas himself ever thought that we would get a great deal of revenue from the higher brackets, in the higher steps above the bill that we had once agreed upon. He does not think so now, I am sure, and I think he is entirely right in assuming that we would get our revenue by starting the normal tax at a higher rate, and, of course, that rate runs all the way through.

The amendment the Senator offers is one which anyone can vote for and is at least as good as the amendment the committee has reported, the only difference being that there is a little less burden, of course, placed upon the relatively small-income taxpayers by the committee bill, that is to say, those whose incomes are relatively small measured on the old scale. They occupy a considerable picture in the whole income-tax program, because, if figures mean anything, if the information which we had in hand means anything, the great fortunes, of millions a year, have virtually faded out of the picture. There will not be any in the next two or three years, at least, whatever rate of income tax we may impose.

The House of Representatives passed a bill with the maximum tax at 40 per cent. In other words, the House applied a maximum rate of 40 per cent at $200,000, as I recollect it.

Mr. CONNALLY. One hundred thousand.

Mr. GEORGE. I thank the Senator; $100,000. The bill is going to conference anyway. It is a question of getting an income-tax schedule which will yield a fair amount of revenue now needed by the Government. It may be best to take the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Texas. It will give us $100,000,000 to $125,000,000 more than we will get out of the committee income-tax rate. That $100,000,000 or $125,000,000 will, of course, enable us to reduce, if not to eliminate entirely, a few more of the excise or special sales taxes.

Not only is that true, Mr. President, but the acceptance of the Connally amendment might make it unnecessary for us to face finally the question of whether we will accept a sales tax, or turnover tax. Every man on the committee, of course, will bear me out when I say that I have strongly opposed a general sales tax. I still oppose it and will continue to oppose it, and the matter of rate on a general sales or turnover tax, whether manufacturers or retail, is not important in my judgment. It is not a matter which gives me great concern. If it were proposed to write a general sales tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent, I should still oppose it, because I know that whatever advantages the sales tax, manufacturers or retail, may have as an emergency tax—and that it has certain advantages I do not undertake to controvert—whatever advantages it has, the real drive back of the demand for the sales tax is to get away from the income tax as the basic consideration in our scheme of Federal taxation.

I oppose it because I have well-grounded and definitely fixed objections to a sales tax. I do not want to enumerate them; it is wholly immaterial at this stage, at least, in the consideration of this matter. But the Connally amendment has an important bearing upon the possible decision we will be called upon to make at some subsequent stage in the consideration of the tax bill. It is not quite so high as the 1918 rates proposed by the Senator from Michigan. Even with that suggestion I have great sympathy; and if I had believed that it would raise the amount of revenue the Senator from Michigan believes it would raise, I might have been persuaded to vote for the 1918 rates, which he has proposed.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas has, I believe, all of the virtues and will raise quite as much revenue; if not quite so much, certainly it is a fairer levy upon the taxpayers in the lower brackets than the 1918 rates.

I have no particular quarrel with the 1918 rates; and if I believed or if I am convinced ultimately that they will produce the amount of revenue estimated by the distinguished Senator from Michigan, I may go along with those rates. I believe the Connally amendment is a fairer basis of rates. It is fairer upon those who fall in the lower brackets, but I unhesitatingly say that I shall take the 1918 rates or the Connally amendment before I will go an inch toward a general sales tax.

Without elaboration, I am opposed to the sales tax because it is an indirect tax. It breeds extravagance in government. Economy in government will disappear when we come to depend in this country upon indirect taxes exclusively. I am opposed to it because the gross income has no necessary relation whatever to the net income. I am opposed to it again because the sales tax, in whatever form, necessarily takes a higher percentage of the income of the poor and the average man than of the rich man. I am opposed to it in the fourth place because the force back of the drive is to eliminate the graduated principle from Federal taxation, not immediately but ultimately, because the old German proverb is true now as ever—He who says A must say B, and the nose of the camel under the tent virtually means the whole camel within the tent.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator has perhaps seen the articles and editorials written by Arthur Brisbane, who receives a salary of $300,000 or $400,000 a year. He is the master mind behind that effort to get the camel's nose under the tent so as to get free from the income tax. I just wondered if the Senator had had occasion to observe his editorials?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I have noticed them.

During the delivery of Mr. GEORGE's speech—

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, the pages of the Senate have been given tickets to the circus, half of them for to-night and half of them for to-morrow night. I ask unanimous consent that they may be excused for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it shall take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow. I do this because some Senators have been unable to-day to answer their mail because of the early hour of meeting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

After the conclusion of Mr. GEORGE's speech—

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] quite correctly stated that he had always in the committee opposed the general sales tax. I want to suggest to other Senators similarly situated that every tax those who advocate the sales tax can take out of the bill adds to the weight of their argument later on when they come back to insist upon a sales tax to raise the needed revenue. The Senator from Georgia can best serve those who are opposed to the sales tax by voting for my amendment and thereby lessening the amount which will remain to urge the sales tax as a means of filling the deficit.

I wish to invite the attention of the Senator from Georgia and others, however, to the fact that my amendment differs wholly from the pending Finance Committee bill, not simply in the higher brackets of 55 per cent, but it increases the revenue all along the line. For example, on incomes from $1,000 to $2,000 the committee bill would raise $17,800,000, whereas my amendment would raise $26,400,000. There is an increase of over $9,000,000 in that one bracket. From incomes of $2,000 to $3,000 the Finance Committee bill would raise $18,000,000 and my amendment would raise $21,000,000. That is $3,000,000 more, and it is not an inconsiderable sum. There is almost as much there in one bracket as would be raised by the second-class postage increase provided for in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That is over and above the exemption?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; I am talking about the man who pays taxes on the amounts mentioned over and above the exemption.

On incomes of $3,000 to $5,000 the Finance Committee bill raises only $28,000,000 while my amendment would raise $48,000,000, or a difference of $20,000,000 in that one bracket.

On incomes of $5,000 to $10,000 the Finance Committee bill raises $41,000,000. The amendment which I have offered would raise $69,000,000, or $28,000,000 more right there.

On incomes of $10,000 to $25,000 the Finance Committee bill would raise $80,000,000, while my amendment would raise $119,000,000, an increase of $39,000,000 in that one bracket. On incomes of from $10,000 to $25,000 the rates are not heavy, and yet in that single bracket we would get $39,000,000 more under my amendment.

On incomes of $25,000 to $50,000 the rates are not high. The Finance Committee bill would raise $93,000,000 while my amendment would raise over $103,000,000, an increase of $10,000,000 in the single bracket on men having incomes of $25,000 to $50,000 who can pay the taxes at these moderate rates without hardship.

The next incomes are those from $50,000 to $100,000; and who is there here to hold up his hand in horror and say that a man with an income of $50,000 to $100,000 can not pay a reasonable income tax? While the Finance Committee bill would raise $103,000,000, under my amendment we would raise $115,000,000 or $12,000,000 more on incomes from $50,000 to $100,000. What I want to impress upon Senators is the fact that they need not be freightened by the 55 per cent rate proposed in my amendment because it is not simply penalizing a few men with very large incomes, but we are taxing the men with moderate incomes as well.

Then come incomes from $100,000 to $150,000, and who is there to say a man with an income like that ought not to have his income tax increased in this hour of the Nation's great need for money? It is just as important to add to the burden of men with that kind of an income as it is to tax the amusements of the common people. It is just as sound to increase the tax on a man with an income of $100,000 as it is to require the man who posts a letter in the mail to pay 50 per cent more postage upon it than he paid last year. On incomes of $100,000 to $150,000 the Finance Committee bill would raise $49,000,000, while under my amendment we would raise $57,000,000.

On incomes of $150,000 to $300,000 the committee bill would raise $63,000,000, while my amendment would raise $83,000,000. We would get $20,000,000 a year more under my amendment from incomes of $150,000 to $300,000. Why should we not do so? The great Government that has given an opportunity to make incomes of $150,000 to $300,000 is in need. It needs funds with which to maintain the agencies under which those men have prospered and under which they have grown rich.

In this hour in which the President and others say that conditions are comparable to those of war, shall the Senate hesitate to impose an income tax on the man with $150,000 to $300,000 annual income and then go out like a detective hunting for little chinchy, picayunish excise taxes to lay upon the backs of the poor and upon the backs of the needy, and yet in the name of drying up business hold back from taxing men with incomes of $150,000 to $300,000.

Incomes of $300,000 to $500,000 would yield under the Finance Committee bill $35,000,000, while under my amendment we would get $41,000,000. On incomes of $500,000 to $1,000,000 the Finance Committee bill would raise $34,000,000 while under my amendment we would raise $37,000,000.

The Senator from Georgia stated that we would not get any increased revenue in the higher brackets. We do get increased revenue in the higher bracket. There is $3,000,000 in the last one mentioned. On incomes over $1,000,000 the Finance Committee bill would raise $56,000,000 and my amendment would raise $58,000,000.

Why is it we do not get more money in the higher brackets? It is simply because there are only a few men drawing those high incomes. When we get to the $1,000,000 incomes the men having incomes in that range are relatively very few. If we get an appreciable portion of their income, we are not going to raise the total amount of revenue; but in this particular class, with incomes from $500,000 up, my amendment will get $5,000,000 more money in that one bracket than the pending committee bill. Is $5,000,000 an inconsiderable sum? We propose to raise $5,000,000 in this bill on second-class postage. In this bracket alone relating to men with incomes from $500,000 up my amendment would bring in $5,000,0000 more than the committee bill.

Mr. President, I was prompted to make these additional remarks by the suggestion of Senators that my amendment would not increase the revenue in the higher brackets. It increases the revenue in all the brackets. I am not seeking to tax the great rich and eliminate the men with the smaller and moderate incomes. The obligations due to the Government in this hour rest upon every citizen. Whenever we get above the normal exemption and begin to levy income taxes, I believe the Government is justified in increasing the rates all along the line, increasing the small man's burden and let him know that he is a part of the Government. Let him know that he has to help bear the burden. Let him feel himself conscious of the effect of taxation and thereby have his desire increased to see that our Government is run economically. Let him feel that when taxes are levied and money is spent it is his money. But I would not tax the small man without also taxing the great and powerful and rich man. If we increase the lower brackets, justice requires that we continue that same relationship and let the increased surtaxes go on up until we reach the very highest.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I probably am responsible for some of the remarks being made by the Senator about the increases in the higher brackets. I probably misspoke myself on that point. I did not mean to say that the amendment does not affect the higher brackets, but it necessarily affects in a greater percentage the smaller brackets. I want to have the RECORD corrected in that respect.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. Of course, I do not want to do the Senator any injustice and I was not endeavoring to suggest that he was not correct. The point I undertook to make was that the Senator was indicating that the increase from 45 to 55 per cent did not necessarily increase the revenue, because there are fewer incomes in the higher brackets. I am pointing out that even under present conditions there is no reason why men with incomes above $1,000,000 should not pay $2,000,000 more, as provided by my amendment, than they would pay in that bracket under the Finance Committee bill.

Mr. President, in conclusion I see no reason on earth why under the bill as passed by the House, incomes, for instance, should be graduated up to $100,000 and then stop. I see no reason why under the Finance Committee bill 45 per cent should be in any particular a holy ratio. If graduated income taxes are sound, and they are sound, then there is no reason on earth for stopping the progressive tax at incomes of $100,000 a year. It should go on up and maintain the same fair relationship in the higher incomes. I know of nothing sacred about an income simply because it is great. All the incomes of the people of the United States in a way are sacred because they represent the earnings from their savings or from their toil, but this Government is not only going to tax income, it is going to tax in many cases the necessities of the people; it is going to tax those things which either by habit or by taste they have come to regard as necessary, even things necessary to sustain their bodies and provide comforts for their homes or the necessities of entertainment which they feel necessary for the relaxation of their minds.

Mr. President, as between these two sources of taxation I have little choice. If it comes to taxing the necessities of the people or taxing individuals having incomes, having profits, having money coming in over and above their needs or normal wants, I believe that the great bulk of the taxes ought to come out of profits, out of incomes. In fixing those taxes, I regard nothing sacred up at the top. I want to tax the small man and I want to tax the big man, to tax the small man in a small way because he is small, and to tax the great income in a greater percentage because it is great, not because of the individual who happens to possess it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bailey	Davis	Jones	Smith
Barkley	Dickinson	Keyes	Smoot
Bingham	Dill	King	Stephens
Blaine	Fess	La Follette	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	Frazier	Long	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	George	McGill	Townsend
Broussard	Glenn	Metcalf	Trammell
Bulkley	Goldsborough	Moses	Tydings
Bulow	Gore	Norris	Vandenberg
Capper	Hale	Nye	Wagner
Carey	Harrison	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Cohen	Hatfield	Reed	Walsh, Mont.
Connally	Hawes	Robinson, Ind.	Watson
Copeland	Hayden	Sheppard
Costigan	Hull	Shipstead
Couzens	Johnson	Shortridge

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I had understood from the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that we would remain in session for an hour or so longer. I had hoped that we might recess this evening a little earlier than was contemplated. We have been here for a considerable time to-day. I am not going to make any motion to recess; I rather feel that such a suggestion should come from some of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber. However, after having conferred with many of the Senators during the day, I believe that a spirit of harmony or near harmony almost pervades the Senate.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] made a very notable speech here this evening to which I am very sorry some of the Senators here and those who are absent did not have an opportunity to listen. I do not think that the other members of the Committee on Finance and of the Senate, had they knowledge of what was contained in the speech of the Senator from Georgia, would want to vote on the pending amendment until they had a chance to peruse those remarks, at least those who did not hear them.

The Senator from Georgia is a member of the Finance Committee, which reported the pending bill. I gather from his remarks that he feels that the best thing to do is to vote for the Connally amendment, although I suppose he is one of the members of the Finance Committee who voted to report the pending bill with the schedule on income taxes written as it now appears in the bill. He now says, however, after giving more or less a history of the trials and tribulations and labors of the committee, after giving us the details of the agonizing and absorbing torture which the members of the committee suffered in undertaking to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the problem presented, that, after more mature consideration and discussion, he reaches the conclusion that probably the best thing to do now would be to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

He goes further than that and suggests if the estimates of receipts under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] are as stated that probably it would be best even to adopt the schedules of that amendment, indicating, Mr. President, that the members of the Senate, after consultation with one another, are rather more inclined to yield to the general knowledge of the country than to some special knowledge that might have suddenly dawned on them through the mind and thought of the Secretary of the Treasury.

It rather seems that the hurry-up call which the Secretary of the Treasury gave himself fades into insignificance on a consideration of the normal functions of the Members of the Senate in their discussions with one another. I believe, Mr. President and Senators, that more discussion among us, more consideration of the questions involved by the 96 Members of the Senate, coming from various sections of the country, will permit us to have a better understanding. I do not see that there is anything which to-night impels us to act in a hurry about this matter, though I find myself mellowing to the demands of my fellow Members of this body to hurry these discussions which many people in the remote sections of my country would give half the earnings of their lifetime to hear. I find that several Members of this body have not spoken, and I believe that within the next two and a half hours they might decide that they want to speak.

I do not propose to be selfish about this matter. If I am asked by any of my colleagues to yield, I am going to yield to them, so that they may speak upon this subject; and by the early hours of morning they can read the lines and ciphers and signals and the logic that is contained in the addresses to which they have not had the opportunity to listen here this evening. If they have not had the opportunity to listen to them, they will have the opportunity to read them before I have surrendered the floor, I hope.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I gladly yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Do I understand that the Senator is willing to agree upon a time for a vote on this amendment to-morrow? I take it from what the Senator says that he would like to have the Members of the Senate have an opportunity to read the speech of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. LONG. That is one of the things, Mr. President; yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So that if we could have a vote perhaps early after meeting in the morning, it would save our remaining here to-night without a quorum.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to propound a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir. I yield to the Senator from Texas and to the Senator from Utah if he desires me to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator if the unanimous-consent agreement means that we are to take a recess at this time?

Mr. CONNALLY. I had not propounded it. I was going to make a unanimous-consent request that the Senate vote to-morrow, not later than 1 o'clock, on my amendment. If the Senator from Utah wants to couple with that any other request about recessing or going on to other portions of the bill he can say so.

I propose this request, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield for that purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the unanimous-consent agreement, provided we go on until 10 o'clock to-night.

Mr. CONNALLY. I make the following unanimous-consent request——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield for that purpose?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Texas; yes, sir.

Mr. CONNALLY. I make the request that it be unanimously agreed that the Senate vote on my amendment not later than 1 o'clock to-morrow, and that in the meantime the Senate proceed with the bill as to other items following this one.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I have another suggestion to make; so I will ask him to withhold that just at this moment. Then I shall be glad to yield to him.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will, of course. I made the request just to save time.

Mr. LONG. I was going to suggest that if I were convinced that enough of the Senators who have come in have been inspired by the air which has pervaded this body in the last few minutes so that the Connally amendment would be adopted to-night, I should be glad to yield the floor for that purpose. I am not yet inspired to that belief, though I think that by the time they have had an opportunity to consider what has been said here, particularly by the Senator from Georgia, and some of the things that have been said inferentially by the Senator from Utah, they will vote to adopt the Connally amendment by to-morrow.

I want to make this further suggestion: I was discussing this matter with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] this afternoon. He did not exactly agree with my conclusions; but I discussed the matter with some other Senators, chiefly on the other side, and I met with a more favorable response. If we can agree on the amendment of the Senator from Texas, that is going to avoid a prolonged discussion, and it is going to mean that we should be able to go forward with this bill much more expeditiously. If, however, we are not going to agree to his amendment, it becomes apparent that those of us who wish to see a speedy enactment of this bill into law are going to have to urge that we set aside, as I understand the Finance Committee did, the income-tax and inheritance-tax schedules, and go to the excise taxes, and decide those matters, so that then we may know what in reality we are going to have to face in the way of income taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to ask the Senator if he thinks there is a Senator in this body who has not already made up his mind as to how he is going to vote upon this question.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have witnessed changes occurring here lately. I do not think the Senator from Utah has his mind made up, from the way he talks to me. I believe he is about ready to change his mind. I do not think he is nearly so bad as I thought he was on this subject. I may be wrong about that.

Mr. SMOOT. I would rather have the Senator from Utah answer that question.

Mr. LONG. I say, I may be wrong about that. I can judge only from looks and signs. I may have misjudged the Senator. I was greatly impressed by that fact, however; and I was particularly impressed by the statement of the Senator from Georgia, coming from the committee, who stood here this evening and sponsored the best interests of the country in adopting the Connally amendment, and possibly in going back and adopting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]. It indicates, to my mind, learned statesmanship. It indicates, to my mind, that we are beginning to see, from the influence that is pervading the country, the necessity of a fair, equitable tax bill that will raise revenue from the people who make it.

My belief is, as an example, that my interrogator, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is confused. He only needs time to get his sights together on this question. He has spoken of no objection that he has to the bill except that it might need some reform in the $3,000 and $5,000 income brackets. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has undertaken to compromise that matter and to point out to the Senator that an adjustment could be made of those items, and the Senator from Utah has answered him that if a change were made in those items the bill would not produce the necessary revenue. So I believe that when the Senator has slept over the night and has read his own words that to strike out even two lines of the Connally amendment would not give the revenue needed, he certainly is not going to want to strike out 60 more lines of the same amendment when he knows that to strike out two lines of the Connally amendment would not give the revenue that the Government needs.

Why, if we had stricken out the two lines, as suggested by the Senator from Nebraska, it would not have affected any schedule that has been reported by the committee of which the Senator from Utah is the chairman. It would have left the incomes of $3,000 and under $5,000 exactly as they have been reported by the Finance Committee, and if the Senator from Utah feels the necessity, as his own words—which he no doubt has already read—will show, if he feels that we can not strike out two lines of the Connally amendment, certainly he will see the necessity of taking it all.

It would be most unfortunate for this influence that might have come from the Treasury or from the White House to pervade any Member of the Senate and have him be convinced contrary to his own logic; and that is what I fear would be done here if we were to adjourn this session of the Senate until these members of the committee have had an opportunity to read their own words and thoughts, and analyze their own logic, and read the memorable statements that have been made by one another.

I think, though, that if we accept the Connally amendment, we may later on decide to go back and accept the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]. We may later do that, as the Senator from Georgia, who voted against it to-day, well says himself.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the Senator yield to me to propound another unanimous-consent request?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Was the first unanimous-consent request presented?

Mr. LONG. I asked the Senator to withhold it for a minute.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Louisiana asked that I withhold it at the time.

Mr. President, I make the following unanimous-consent request: That for the present the Senate proceed with other provisions of the bill in the regular order, and that to-morrow, when the Senate convenes, debate be had on the pending amendment until 1.30 o'clock, and that the vote then come on my amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Not later than 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TYDINGS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. TYDINGS. And, while I am on my feet, I should like to say——

Mr. LONG. I do not yield to the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator must yield when unanimous consent is asked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I will yield to the Senator from Maryland, Mr. President.

Mr. TYDINGS. I want to give my reasons for objecting—that we have this tax bill before us now, and the country wants it enacted into law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Louisiana yielded to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I have yielded to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Have I the floor now?

Mr. LONG. I have yielded to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor. He has yielded to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. All right.

My reason for objecting is that the country wants this tax bill passed speedily, and I shall object to delaying the votes upon its consideration when we have had full debate on it and the Senate is here in session and ready to have a vote.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have privately interviewed the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] this evening and I have interviewed the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and some others, including the leader on the Republican side. I have said to them that if we would agree to set aside the income and inheritance taxes until we had gone into the excise taxes, as I understood the Senator from Mississippi to say the Finance Committee found it necessary to do—that is, to dispose of the sales tax and get through with it—then after we had disposed of it and gotten through with it we would be in position to consider the income taxes and the inheritance taxes, and it would not be the bone of contention that it is otherwise going to be in this bill.

I say to the Senators in charge of this bill that we ought to do one of two things if we want to see a speedy passage of this bill. When we have only 18 men on the Finance Committee who row among themselves over this bill as they have done, with only 18 of them there, sitting night after night with nothing whatever to consider except such matters as they wanted to consider themselves, and then see them take three weeks or a month, how can we expect, unless we adopt the experience of that committee, to take less than three weeks or a month to dispose of the bill?

So I was suggesting to the Senator from Utah and the other leaders on the Republican side, and I found considerable support, that the thing for us to do is to take up the automobile tax and say whether or not we are going to penalize the automobile trade, and to take up the other various and sundry taxes that have been written in and written out so fast that I am afraid to mention which ones they are because they may have been written out. I am safe in mentioning the income-tax schedules, because they have been rehearsed here, though I could have made the same mistake between nightfall and the rise of the sun had I not heard the statements made here this evening.

Let us take up the automobile tax, and let us take up the theater tax. I do not believe that the Senate, after taking up those items, is going to approve, by a jug full, all that has been done by the Finance Committee. But let us take up those taxes and pass on them, see which ones of them we are going to take, just as the Senate Finance Committee found it necessary to do. A precedent of that kind I think should be of some influence in this case.

After we have disposed of them, we will know what we have to do with the income taxes and with the inheritance taxes, and give that a little time, as the Senator from Georgia suggests. Let us have a little bit more investigation, if it has not been definitely decided on whether the Finance Committee's official staff is more correct than that of the Treasury Department, or vice versa, in order to estimate the amount of revenue that is to be had from this bill when we finally come to a consideration of the income tax and the inheritance tax provisions.

We know we need the revenue; we know the Government needs the revenue; that it can not be expected to survive and perform its functions without the revenue. If we need the revenue, why not let us agree and the committee agree to go along as has been expressed by the Senator from Georgia here this afternoon, to support this amendment, and let the amendment be adopted, and then we can go along. Otherwise we will practically have to admit here some day before very long that we will have to take up the provisions of this bill beginning with the excise taxes and go on through.

Perhaps I have restated that proposition several times, but I have done so in an undertaking to make myself clear that if we want to pass the bill and raise the revenue, as we are trying to do, the best thing that could be agreed on the two sides of this Chamber is that we will take the Connally amendment as a basis. That is the committee's basis. Let us stand by the committee; let us take its opinion of this matter as it reported at one time prior to having decided upon some change. The committee has voted, gentlemen of the Senate, 11 to 7 for the Connally amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to say to the Senator from Louisiana that he is no more anxious to get my amendment adopted than I am myself. I disagree with the Senator, though, about the strategy of the situation, perhaps. I do not want to be put in the attitude, so far as I am concerned, of delaying action on the amendment or on the bill. We have to drive ahead here if we are to get it through. I was wondering whether the Senator would not be willing that we should go on to-night with other features of the bill and vote to-morrow at 1 o'clock on my amendment, when we would have a larger attendance, and have an hour of time for debate, in which time we could explain the amendment to those who are now absent. A great many Senators who are favorable to my amendment are extremely anxious to go ahead on other items of the bill to-night, and I am afraid we are going to lose some of those votes if we do not adopt some such course as I suggest.

Mr. LONG. What items of the bill does the Senator suggest we take up?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let us just go on with whatever is next.

Mr. LONG. The next items?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sure that everybody wants to get the bill hastened along, and I do not suppose the Senator in charge of the bill, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] would have any objection to fixing a time for a vote on the pending amendment to-morrow, with a limitation of debate on any other amendment which might be offered to this particular provision of the bill. I think we might save time by that, and then we could go on and read the bill, because there are many, many pages which we must cover if we are to conclude the consideration of the bill.

While I am on my feet, may I be permitted to say that I would object to any unanimous consent that we withhold the consideration of the income and surtax features of the bill until the last? I told the Senator from Louisiana when I was approached on that proposition that one of the great troubles in the Committee on Finance was that there were elements in the committee working in the hope that they might get a sales-tax provision in the bill, and that they voted against the excise taxes in the bill, throwing upon some of us other and more humble members of the committee the burden of voting on those propositions in the hope of balancing the Budget. So if these provisions should be put off until the last, some of us would find ourselves in the very bad position of being forced to vote, in order to balance the Budget, for certain excise taxes, while others could say, "I am going to vote for the income tax and the surtax provision when it comes along."

It is my opinion that we ought to get rid of the surtax and income-tax provision within a reasonable time. If we do not want to vote on it now, let us set a time for a vote, fix a limited time on other amendments which might be offered to it. Before we get into the excise-tax provisions, or on the nuisance taxes, we ought to have a vote upon the sales tax, so that we can determine in the beginning whether we are going to have a sales tax or whether we are not going to have a sales tax. If we are to have a sales tax, and these high surtaxes are not raised very high, then I suppose Members of the Senate would feel under more obligation, in order to balance the Budget, to vote for such excise taxes, than they would if these two propositions were held off to the last because they would say, "I intend to vote so-and-so in the future, and I will vote against this now."

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I was going to say to the Senator from Mississippi that there is going to be a chance to vote on the income tax after the consideration of all the amendments of the bill have been concluded, because I filed a motion to reconsider, and am going to have reconsidered the vote on the 1918 rates. So we can not dispose of this section at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood that the Senator had changed his vote.

Mr. COUZENS. I understood the Senator to say that we would not have a chance to consider the income tax and surtax rates until after we had concluded with this discussion; but we will have opportunity.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand. I think the income-tax provision and the surtax provision, as well as the sales tax, should be voted on before we get into the nuisance taxes.

Mr. COUZENS. I have already filed a motion to reconsider the vote on the surtax provision, and that will come up after the nuisance taxes have been voted on.

Mr. HARRISON. And under the rules of the Senate the Senator can file a motion to reconsider at the last.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to say to the Senator from Mississippi that his proposition was the exact one I made to the Senate, that we pass this item over for to-night and take it up to-morrow, and in the meantime, between now and 10 o'clock, we could take up other items in the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. Routine items?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I really do not know why the Senator did not agree to that.

Mr. LONG. I did not understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. I put the proposition to the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, what is the point in not voting on this amendment to-night?

Mr. LONG. I want to discuss the matter. I have a right to discuss it.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator wants to discuss it, let him discuss it now. I shall object to putting it over.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to make clear my attitude, if the Senator from Louisiana will yield.

Mr. LONG. I think we understand the Senator's attitude. He would like to have me cease talking, and I prefer not to do that.

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. LONG. All right.

Mr. CONNALLY. My purpose was to postpone a vote until to-morrow, because there would be a larger attendance then. A great many Senators are absent, and I understood it was the object of the Senator from Louisiana to help postpone the vote until to-morrow. But I thought that we could postpone it by unanimous consent, and have an hour's debate to-morrow, and then go ahead and accommodate the Senator from Utah; and the object of the Senator from Louisiana, as well as of the Senator from Utah, would be accomplished. That was my purpose.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to interfere with any reasonable request made, but I just want to point out that if we are to have night sessions and it gets to be the order of the day that we are going to discuss only at night sessions, and not vote, I will not come to the night sessions. Further than that, I think it is an outrage to drag Members of the Senate here to night sessions unless we are going to do business. The country wants this tax bill passed, and it wants it passed quickly. I am in favor of staying with it until we do the job.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree thoroughly with the Senator from Maryland; but there are a lot of other items in the bill which will take discussion and consideration, and if we can save time and expedite the matter by getting a unanimous consent agreement to-night I think it would be well if we could. I am going to submit a unanimous consent request, if the Senator from Louisiana will permit. We meet at 12 o'clock to-morrow, as I understand?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; we have to meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is already agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. There is a unanimous-consent agreement that we will take a recess?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that at 2:30 o'clock we vote on the Connally amendment——

Mr. SMOOT. At not later than 2.30.

Mr. HARRISON. That at not later than 2.30 to-morrow we vote on the Connally amendment, and that the time after the convening of the Senate to-morrow shall be equally divided between those who favor the amendment and those who oppose the amendment; that no speech on any amendment which may be offered to the surtax or income tax provision of the bill shall be longer than 10 minutes, and that no one shall speak more than once.

Mr. LONG. I will not agree to that at all.

Mr. HARRISON. How much time does the Senator want?

Mr. LONG. I will agree to the first part of the request.

Mr. HARRISON. How much time does the Senator want?

Mr. LONG. I do not want to enter into any agreement like that. I will agree that we vote on the Connally amendment at 2.30 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not offer any suggestion.

Mr. LONG. I will be glad to agree to the first part of the Senator's suggestion, that we vote on the amendment at an early hour to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. HARRISON. I am perfectly willing to limit the speeches to 30 minutes, or 45 minutes, or any other time. Let us get to something real, if we are going to agree to something.

Mr. LONG. I would be glad to agree to what the Senator suggests but for this, that after we have had a speech and everybody has been shut off, and Mr. Ogden Mills comes back and has the same influence on the Members of the Senate that he had the last time, then my mouth would be closed, and I would not be able to be heard. I believe that we ought to have a right to be heard after Senators hear from the White House.

Mr. HARRISON. I have offered to divide the time equally. I have offered to make the time on any new amendment that may be offered to suit the Senator's convenience.

Mr. LONG. But one minute in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury is worth an hour in my hands.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. LONG. I do not want the voice of the people shut out.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the Senator willing now that we should pass this amendment over and spend the balance of the evening in the consideration of other matters?

Mr. HARRISON. I am going to object to any request like that.

Mr. LONG. Now, if I can harmonize these gentlemen, it will be all right. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. Go right along.

Mr. LONG. It appears that I have divided the Senators on the different sides of the aisle again, at least for the time being. The Senator from Utah did not have any more questions?

Mr. SMOOT. Not until 10 o'clock.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I hope that Senators will understand that I am undertaking to save them for themselves and from themselves in one respect in this matter. If I knew that when the Members of the Senate were under the power of their own logic, I would feel one way about the matter. If, on the contrary, I felt that the superabundance of logic and power of expression should descend upon them by night or by morning with the same powerful effect that it seems to have had in persuasion from the Secretary of the Treasury before, then I realize the mistake which could befall us here in this body. I have seen a chance occur here this evening; that is, I felt it, I may have imagined it, and I believe, as we view this case, and as we view the schedules and the needs of the country, and the amounts that are to be raised, we are not going off here like Sindbad the Sailor and say, "Did I say it was one week?" A puff of the pipe and then, "No; I meant a month." Then another puff on the pipe and, "I meant a year." So we are told in the fables of Sindbad the Sailor.

One day the Treasury's report is accepted, and we vote one thing. The next day we vote another. But why the hurry-up call? There were proposals in the House and in the Senate to raise these taxes on the lower brackets, and some of them were voted by various committees.

We did not hear any protest from the Secretary of the Treasury when the lower brackets were increased. There was no visit from Mr. Ogden L. Mills when the income taxes were increased on incomes of less than $6,000 from to 3 to 6 per cent or from 7 to 9 per cent. They did not know he was alive so far as that is concerned.

But lo and behold, when they came along with an amendment that reached up into the higher brackets and raised the rates from 45 per cent to 55 per cent on millionaires, then in posthaste the spirit of the Treasury descended upon them in the form of a dove and charmed them not to do any such thing as to reach into the annointed realms, into those realms of hidden riches. There had been no cry from the Treasury and no protestation from the Treasury up until that time.

Mr. President, we might as well discuss the whole bill, because one peg depends upon the other. It is a common foundation. It is one pile of brick joined together by a common course of mortar. If we remove one brick, we have to put another one in its place.

By the way, I have an amendment that is not a great deal different from the Connally amendment. I have two amendments proposed to this schedule myself, and my discussion of this particular amendment will abbreviate my discussion of my own amendments when they come up.

Mr. WATSON. Are the amendments to the Connally amendment?

Mr. LONG. No.

Mr. WATSON. They are to the provision itself?

Mr. LONG. Yes. I propose the two amendments myself. I took the $100,000, the maximum income that was considered in the calculations of the House, and I extended that up to where, on incomes around $1,000,000, we take 63 per cent and on incomes of $2,000,000 we take 65 per cent. It was not quite as drastic an amendment as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] has proposed. In fact, I find myself becoming a very conservative Member of this body. I find and I fear that result in undertaking to designate what I consider to be necessary in the interest of raising revenue—because I have had that problem myself of raising revenue. I know the trouble anybody has raising revenue. I was once in that dilemma myself in raising revenue for a State, and I know the difficulties and the vicissitudes and trials and turmoil that one must encounter and engender in order to raise revenues to run a goverment.

My heart goes out to those gentlemen who are undertaking to find revenues to support the Government. There is no man with whom I am in more heartfelt sympathy, no man whose experiences I can feel more and for whom I have a brotherly feeling and cooperative spirit than the man undertaking to raise revenue in this bill to support the Government. I feel that I would be recalcitrant should I allow the opportunity to pass here without contributing my advice in this dilemma at an early hour and at an early time when we have hours left to consider it, for if we had not many hours left to consider it, they probably might be wasted in the consideration of more important matters.

But if Senators are going out to the American people with two national conventions staring them in the face, when the dear people are going to convene to nominate a candidate—I hope Senators will excuse me for smiling—but when they are going before two national conventions where the people are to meet to nominate candidates and adopt platforms, how can they go before the thousands and millions of men who pay 10 cents to get into a moving-picture show and tell them they have charged them 10 per cent more for the right to go into a moving-picture show in order that the Senate may keep from having to put higher taxes in the brackets that would have yielded the necessary revenue?

While speaking in such solicitous terms about the poor man, when Senators were afraid that they might tax to the extent of $60 the man who is making $5,000, why not worry about the little Government employee who is getting only $1,400 and who is now going to have $140 taken off of his salary? Why not be a little consistent? Oh, it is going to be bad! It is going to be bad to have $60 in taxes paid by the man with a net income of $5,000. We are told a net income of $5,000 is a pitiful sum after paying all taxes and interest and charges, and then he has to pay $60 in income taxes. That is an outrageous act, and yet Senators are coming back here with an economy bill not to take $60 from the Government employee making $5,000 a year but to take $140 from the man making $1,400. What kind of consistency have we, anyway?

We do not need to cut the Government employees' salaries, and I am not going to vote for any such proposition. We do not need to cut the Government employees' salaries

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. I take for granted the Senator is entirely willing, if not anxious, to pass a tax bill?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. If not this one, then some bill?

Mr. LONG. This one, properly amended.

Mr. WATSON. Of course, the only way we can pass the bill is to go through it and vote on its provisions, one after another.

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator a while ago stated he would be willing to submit to a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the Connally amendment to-morrow afternoon at 2.30 o'clock.

Mr. LONG. Yes; but I am through agreeing to anything now. I am going to express my views. I am feeling the urge to talk as I progress.

Mr. WATSON. I have discovered that to be the fact.

Mr. LONG. I am becoming convinced by my own logic that it is necessary to talk a long time on this matter.

Mr. WATSON. Of course, if the Senator is anxious to pass the bill after ample discussion, the only thing to do is to vote. I am wondering whether or not the Senator would agree to a unanimous-consent understanding that we should vote on the Connally amendment to-morrow afternoon and then his amendment follow with a time fixed for the discussion of his amendment that will be satisfactory to him.

Mr. LONG. I have concluded, since I have been talking here, that we ought to keep the Senate in session until it is too late for Senators to go and see the Secretary of the Treasury and get back here any length of time before we convene again to-morrow. I think it is necessary that we send Senators home when it is too late to see the Secretary of the Treasury to-night and that we should come back here two or three hours before they have had a chance to see him in the morning so that Senators can follow their own dictates.

Mr. WATSON. The Secretary of the Treasury is a pretty vigorous man and he might stay up late, too.

Mr. LONG. That is what I am afraid of.

Mr. WATSON. I think, if the Senator is really anxious to pass the bill—and I know he is, because he said so——

Mr. LONG. I think the Senator from Indiana and I could get together on this matter without any trouble.

Mr. WATSON. I think so, too.

Mr. LONG. However, there has been objection.

Mr. WATSON. I really do wish, in the interest of expediting and faciliting the passage of the measure, that the Senator would agree on some time to vote on the Connally amendment.

Mr. LONG. I think I am expediting the passage of the bill now. I think within a week's time the Senator will agree that what I have undertaken to do and say here to-night has been of signal service in hastening the final passage of the tax bill, because if we stay here and find ourselves in a state of harangue and confusion over whether or not we are going to adopt onerous and burdensome taxes on every little man who goes to a 10-cent moving-picture show——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I have heard it said so many times that there is a tax on the 10-cent admission to a moving-picture show that I think I should correct the statement. There is no such thing proposed in the bill.

Mr. LONG. I beg to be corrected. What is it?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a tax on 11 cents and above, so that the 10-cent moving picture is not taxed according to the terms of the bill.

Mr. LONG. May the Lord bless the committee. [Laughter.] It is only on an 11-cent admission that the poor man is to be taxed.

Mr. SMOOT. We have had the 10-cent moving-picture show spoken of so many times that I am tired of it.

Mr. LONG. All right; I will amend my remarks accordingly. I was mistaken, and I shall not make a mistake of that proportion while I am discussing other items and features of the bill.

The United States is to become a tax collector from 120,000,000 people. We are going to stretch out our hands and collect taxes from 120,000,000 people. While we are talking about luxury taxes, let me say the moving-picture show is not a luxury. An automobile is not a luxury. There are not any luxuries in the bill that are being taxed. Even a glass of beer, according to the statement that has been made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], would not be a luxury if it were put in the bill. There are not any luxuries in the bill. The man who toils from sunup to sundown—Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and half of Sunday—who has no chance to go to any little place except maybe a public park or moving picture is to be taxed on an 11-cent admission ticket.

It is almost a crime—indeed, it is almost a crime to put a tax upon the little 11-cent show, because Senators say they want to keep from taxing the man who is making $1,000,000 clear or is making $5,000 clear for fear he may invest his money in municipal and State securities. I think the term "municipal" is broad enough that it covers State securities and securities of municipalities. But Senators want to tax the man who goes to the moving-picture show, and the only reason given is that it is necessary to balance the Budget; and in order to balance the Budget it becomes necessary and essential that we penalize every little man who buys a radio, every little man who buys a Ford car, every little man who carries his wife and two children to a picture show. It does not make any difference whether he has made a dime or not, he has to pay a tax. If he has anything whatever in the form of the reasonable conveniences that the world affords to-day, he has to pay a tax. And for what?

Mr. President, the reason is that the bill means, if it is enacted into law, to cram enough sales taxes into the law to form a foundation of bedrock underneath the sales-tax principle to get it embedded into the American tax system, so the Government will get more and more under the sales-tax system from day to day and from year to year until the men at the top have been relieved of paying the enormous income taxes that they should be paying and until they have done what Mr. Hearst and Mr. Brisbane said—until they have made away with the innocuous inheritance and income taxes in this country.

Taking up the amendment—by the way, Mr. President, I do not believe there is a quorum present. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been no business transacted since the last quorum call.

Mr. LONG. There has been no business transacted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. There has been none at all.

Mr. LONG. Very well; that is all right. Let us see what is in this bill, in order that I may not misstate it. Let us see what it is proposed to tax here. I do not disagree with the tariff items in the bill. I disagree with some of the criticisms that have been made against this bill on that account. The only fault I have with the proposed tariff on oil is that it was not made high enough. The only fault I have to find with the tariff on copper is that it was not made high enough. I do not think any criticism can attach to the committee because of the tariff items in the bill. We live in a tariff world, a tariff has been put on everything we buy, and it is not fair to some of us that we be penalized by a tariff on everything we consume and have no tariff on the commodities we produce.

The items in this bill are embraced in a long list; a list long enough to go from Dan to Beersheba, stretching out all over the country. One would have to be a Philadelphia lawyer to tell on what he will have to pay taxes by the time he gets through this bill. Its provisions have got to be in the head of every man who goes to a moving-picture show or who operates one in this country. There will be many prosecutions under this book of various and sundry rules. There never was a book of rules ever published on which a man will have to keep his hand all the time to the extent he will if it shall be enacted into law. Every man in the United States living under the United States Government may be prosecuted for not paying taxes under one schedule or another, because, I presume, there is a penal clause attached to a violation of the provisions of the bill. Every law of this kind winds up with a penal provision. I have hardly ever seen a postmaster who could not be fined under the laws on the statute books for not complying with the Federal provisions regarding the reporting and keeping of funds. Scattered through the various statutes there are penal provisions. So under this bill if a man does not pay the tax on 11 cents every time he goes to a moving-picture theater he is guilty of a violation of the law.

There is a penalty for the mere failure to pay 1 or 2 copper cents—a little picayunish, chinchy business—but the Government is going into it and ransack every corner of the country to take its toll. So every little old man going into a moving-picture show, who does not know the law, is liable to be prosecuted on Monday morning, and those guilty of not paying the tax will be brought perhaps from one part of the country to the other.

Talk about Federal tyranny! There never was a worse thing than to have a multiplication of laws on top of laws. The first thing we know the Government will be prosecuting 40 or 50 people because they have not paid a copper cent or two for going to a moving-picture show. The same thing is true of those who purchase radios. They have got to know the law; and they have got to pay the exact amount of tax that is prescribed and no less; otherwise, they will be subjected to Federal prosecution.

How much better, how much more safe and stable it would be if, instead of raising funds from the poor little fellow who it may be has not made a thousand dollars in a year, we should raise them from those of large incomes. I will tell you, Senators, that 95 per cent of the people to-day who are going to moving-picture shows did not make a thousand dollars last year; and when we put a tax on them we are putting it upon people who have not thrived instead of putting it on people who have thrived.

Senators say that it is a useless thing to put a tax on large incomes, because people are not making money. It is said there is no use putting the proposed tax on such incomes.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. In the estimates made by Mr. Parker, of the general tax committee, and the estimates by the Treasury Department of the 1918 rates and of the committee rates, there was a difference. As I understand the Senator from Utah, the estimate of the Treasury Department was that $193,000,000 would be raised under the committee bill. The estimate of Mr. Parker was that some $331,000,000 would be raised under the proposed amendment which was voted down this afternoon. There is a difference in the estimates.

I move, Mr. President, that the Senate request the Treasury Department to furnish the Senate an estimate of the amounts to be raised in each of the brackets, because I am convinced from what I am able to learn that the estimates of the Treasury Department do not show the brackets in which these increases will occur. Of course, it is very important to know how the Treasury estimate is divided up between the different brackets.

So I ask unanimous consent that the Senate request the Treasury Department to furnish the Senate with an estimate of the amount to be raised in the various brackets by the 1918 schedule of rates which was debated this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the Treasury Department be requested to submit data as to the 1918 rates——

Mr. COUZENS. By brackets.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By brackets. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The request of Mr. COUZENS was reduced to writing in the form of a resolution (S. Res. 214), which was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish the Senate estimates for the calendar year 1932 of the revenue that would be raised by each of the income-tax brackets under the revenue act of 1918.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, now that some business has been transacted, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am willing to yield for the purpose indicated if it does not take the floor away from me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Louisiana that he is not compelled to yield to another Senator to raise the point as to the presence of a quorum.

Mr. LONG. I do not need a quorum. I thank the Senator from Maryland, but I refuse to yield. It does not make any difference. I do not wish to bring any Senator here against his will. Let Senators go home; but I thank the Senator from Maryland very much. I am afraid I am not going to have time enough to say what I want to say. If the Senate shall take a recess at 10 o'clock, I probably will not have gotten through. I am going through this thing alphabetically, and I have only gotten down to the "F's."

What I was undertaking to say I hoped would appeal to Senators who come from my section of the country and from the broad, open spaces as well as from the cities. We have tried to deliver this country from Federal bureaucracy in every way we could. We realize that the ordinary man does not understand the Federal Government very well. Of all the lawyers in the United States Senate to-day, Mr. President—and I am one of them; I have practiced before the Federal courts as well as before the State courts—probably a third of them understand the methods of procedure of any Federal court in which he practices. The Federal courts are looked upon as foreign soil.

I trust the Senator from Utah heard what I said. I said, and I restate it, as to the Federal rules of procedure in the Federal courts that probably not one-third of the lawyers of the Senate, I believe—and I am one of them—could to-morrow step into any district or circuit court and understand the rules under which he is going to practice without making a little preparation and looking up the procedure, because even yet the Federal courts are looked upon as foreign soil by a majority of lawyers who practice there. And when an ordinary individual is brought 100 miles away from home and taken into a Federal court he feels like he is going before some foreign tribunal. He does not understand it. If he can get off with a $50 or $75 fine he pays it, and quits.

Under the nefarious sales-tax proposal, as I see it—and I am sure other Senators do not see it that way, or they would not be for it; one or the other of us is bound to be mistaken—there is not a single man in the length and breadth of the United States who would not be amenable to indictment before the Federal courts on half a dozen occasions in a year's time.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is for a tariff on copper and oil, is he not?

Mr. LONG. Oh, yes; I am for a tariff on copper and oil, particularly on oil, and I am willing to vote for a tariff on copper in order to help the other man so that I can get a tariff on oil. There is a lot of criticism around here about trading. If I have got to pay a tariff on everything I am buying, I am willing for the other man to have a tariff on what he produces so that I can get one on what I produce. I realize that I can not get one unless I help the other man have his. There is now a tariff in this country on everything except a few things that the farmers produce. There is a tariff on nearly everything else. If it is going to be continued—and we know it is going to be continued; we can not stop it; we tried that for a long time, but we could not do it—if it is going to be continued, if enough votes are going to be obtained to do that, we certainly have justified our claims for a tariff on oil.

We are not going to leave one or two little picayunish things unprotected which now have no protection and which are entitled to just as much protection as anything else and choke ourselves out of getting protection. We believe in being consistent about this matter; and if we are voting for a tariff on our own products, we ought to let the other man have one, too. We are not going to stand in his light. The copper business is absolutely bankrupt in the United States to-day for no other reason in the world than that American interests own mines in Chile, where they employ slave labor for 10 cents a day, so that a man in America having to hire labor at $2 a day can not compete with the foreign copper; that is impossible.

The same thing is true of oil. I remember just as well as if it were yesterday when 28-gravity oil in this country was selling on the Gulf coast, in Louisiana and Texas, at 60 cents a barrel, and they were not running one-fifth of it; they would only run about one-fifth of the production.

Along the Gulf coast, in the Pine Island field, the Edgley field, the Goose Creek field, and the Beaumont field they paid us 60 cents a barrel and only ran one-fifth of it, while away over in California they were buying 16-gravity oil and paying $1.80 a barrel. Why? Because they had congested the Gulf ports with the Mexican and Venezuelan crude and they had to store the oil in our market until they had frozen out the oil fields in that territory. That is why we favor a tariff on oil. It is necessary in order to maintain an independent oil business in this country.

Now, let me get back to the main subject, because what I have said is a little bit out of order. I had not really come to the tariff schedules in this bill. I was discussing the point that by this bill we are calling upon 120,000,000 people to pay an income tax. It is not called an income tax, but that is the charitable thing to call it. We are calling upon 120,000,000 people to pay taxes every time they go to a moving-picture show; every time they buy an automobile; every time they buy a radio. I think under this bill one would have to pay a tax if he went to a cakewalk. It makes no difference what it is, the individual pays a tax on it. He can not get beyond the confines of meat and bread to eat and the common, ordinary drudgery of daily life without its being called a luxury.

What is a luxury? Is it a luxury for the common, ordinary poor man to go to a show, to listen to a radio, to ride in a Ford car? Is that what you call a luxury? Is that the kind of a luxury upon which you are trying to tax the common, ordinary man of this country, so that you can keep from putting a tax upon the men traveling in their yachts on the high seas, drinking their wines out of golden goblets, and living in every kind of riotous abandonment? In order to keep from putting a tax upon what keeps such a man a millionaire you have got to tax 120,000,000 people on the surface as much as 10 per cent, and higher than that in some of the other things that they may buy and commodities that they may use, you have got to do that in order to save a certain selected few.

I have not the exact figures here. I had them before me. Maybe I still have them in my pocket; but under the amendment that has been proposed here, under the exemption of $2,000 or $2,500, there are only a relatively few people taxed. I would not dispute the figures of the Senator from Utah. I believe he stated yesterday how many people would pay an income tax under this bill—only a relatively few million people.

I will not undertake to state exactly how many there are, because I might make the same proportion of errors that I made before; but only a relatively few people would be called upon to pay this tax—only a very few people; only a few million, and that is all—only a few million! But you have decided the matter—no; I stand corrected. The committee has not decided it. Mr. Mills has decided it, and the committee has accepted Mr. Mills's recommendation.

I remember, Mr. President, when I was the Governor of the State of Louisiana, that I was criticized by the press of the United States and by every political opponent I had because I had gone before the committees in the House and in the Senate of the State of Louisiana and advocated the legislation which I was sponsoring.

I remember when I was assailed by practically every newspaper published in this country, and even by the magazines, on the ground that I had become a political tyrant who dared to walk into the committee rooms of the Members of the House and of the Members of the Senate, imposing my own influence to try to get those committees to report bills upon which I had undertaken to finance or otherwise help the State. That was said to be an act of tyranny; but never had I gone to a committee when a committee had decided a matter and told a committee, "You have decided it wrongly." Never had I gone to a committee when they had made their decision and told them, "Here! You have studied this thing three weeks, but you can not do this. Back up." And they backed up so quickly that you could not even see them when they did it. Never had I done that.

Yet to-day we stand here in the United States Senate noting and witnessing the fact that a committee composed of as fine men as the sun ever shone on, with as fine motives as ever influenced men to action, with intellects that have no superior, have laboriously and consistently studied and worked upon a tax bill, and at the end of those solemn and prayerful labors they have reached the conclusion that there should be a certain list of taxes imposed in order to finance this country; and then, after that is done, we see a member of the Cabinet of the President of the United States, spurred on, as the press tells us, by the demands of the President, walk in and say, "Here! Three weeks do not mean anything to me. It makes no difference what you have decided. I have come here to tell you that the schedule you have written into this law is not the thing to do," or words to that effect. Regardless of the good motives that influenced the men to action, the pitiful result is that to-day we are here in the United States Senate undertaking to get the committee to go back and do what it decided to do itself before the Secretary of the Treasury came in and decided that it was best that it do something else.

I have listened in vain for the logic as to why that drastic, sudden reversal was made. I have listened in vain. I know personally all the Senators composing this committee; but for the life of me, Mr. President and Members of the Senate, I am unable to explain why three weeks of labor of this committee reached one result one night, and just because the Secretary of the Treasury came around the next day, and for no other particular reason except what he had to say, the committee went counter the next day.

This is not the report of a committee. I know that my friend from Utah has only the best interests of this country at heart; but this is not the report of a committee. It may come in here as the report of a committee, but it is like the preacher who bought his sermons. It is like the man who reads his prayer. It is not the report of a committee.

My distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], whom I have loved and honored and at least a part of the time obeyed for a number of years in my political beliefs and doctrines, has made a very elaborate speech here. My neighbor, who breathes the same balmy air of the coast, who lives there in that clime "Where the gray of the night joins the gold of the day," stood up here this evening and said that we ought to stand by the committee. "What boots it," said he—and I am sorry the Senator from Mississippi is not here. I wish some of my friends would send for him and ask him to be present, because I hate to have anything said in his absence that he might feel that he should hear. I so honor and respect the judgment of these men that I am now trying to follow them. I am trying to follow the judgment of the committee. I am trying to follow the deliberate opinions, the judgment of these men after labor and study. I am trying to be loyal to the committee in spite of the committee. I am trying to follow a judgment that is more mature and more capable and safer than to risk the hurry-up judgment of some man who perchance receives the call that something must be done immediately and jumps and delivers his demand without thought.

Mr. HARRISON entered the Chamber.

Mr. LONG. My friend from Mississippi having arrived, as I was saying before my friend from Mississippi entered the Chamber, I listened this morning, and I was almost convinced. No man has ever been more inspired by the logic of any man through a course of years than I have been by the logic of my friend from Mississippi. No man has ever carried the torch by night, no man has ever followed the pillar of cloud by day in the good, cold, solemn ranks of sacred democracy to my heart's delight and satisfaction more than the distinguished Senator from the State of Mississippi. No man's solemn, deliberate judgment should be more respected. No man's ideas, no man's judgment, no man's perseverance for the cause of right should appeal to the heart of patriotism more than the actions of the Senator from Mississippi. And now, as the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Utah hold up their banner and say, "Follow us," "follow the committee," "follow me," "follow me. We have adopted a schedule of 55 per cent. Follow me," and I turned around to follow them; lo and behold, they have left us, and nobody is left but the followers. [Laughter.] The committee has gone; and when the Senator from Mississippi comes here and says, "Stand by the committee," I am reminded of the old man who died up in East Carroll Parish. He put a little poem on the tombstone:

Remember, man, as you pass by,
So as you are so once was I.
So as I am, so you must be.
Prepare to die and follow me.

But the wife who put up the tombstone did not want to be bound by what was on it, and so as a saving grace to herself she wrote two more lines:

To follow you I'm not content
Until I know which way you went.

[Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must admonish the occupants of the galleries that there must be no demonstrations; otherwise the galleries will be cleared.

Mr. LONG. So I have tried to follow the Senator from Mississippi. You have not had anybody who has followed you longer than I have. There is not anybody that respects you more or loves you more in political circles than I do. But as I have tried to follow you, where am I going to go to find you?

I go to your own house and I knock on the door, and you say, "I am here. I will have my instructions in a minute." I go back to your house. I knock on the door again. There is nobody there. I have to go and look for you in the house of Ogden Mills for your opinion. I can not find you home. [Laughter.] You go farther away, and the farther you go the farther you get away from yourself.

I have trouble locating the committee. The farther we go, the more quizzical we become, the less presence we find.

It reminds me of the time back up in my country when one of our fellow citizens had left, one of our colored brethren, vowing vengeance against another one. He came home one Saturday night, after he had gone off and earned enough money to buy a Harrington & Richardson pistol, to get vengeance against the man who was his superior in physical virtues and power. He knocked on the door. "Who's in there?" The answer came, "Mose Jackson." "Then, Mose, let me come in. I has come here to settle matters." The voice came back, "This ain't Mose Jackson that is here now. This is where Mose lives, but Mose is out." Then the nigger said, "All right; if Mose lives there, open the door. I'm going to wait for him." He said, "I think you misunderstood me. This ain't where Mose Jackson lives; this is where Mose Jackson used to live."

"Then let me in there, if Mose Jackson ever did live there." "You must have misunderstood me, brother. Mose Jackson ain't ever lived here." [Laughter.]

So we started out with this committee. They took up their bill. "This is us. This is me." They went about two or three more days, and they said, "No; this ain't us; but this is where we was." [Laughter.] Then they went a little bit longer, and now the Senators from Utah and from Mississippi come in here and say, "No; we never was over there. [Laughter.] We has been here all the time." [Laughter.]

Oh, if we were to adopt this thing gentlemen are proposing here it would be a sad plight. It is said it would affect some little people who are making from $3,000 to $5,000 a year; that it would cost them $60 a head. If they made $5,000 the little women and children would come out to see them as they went out to the banquets, where they would not speak unless there were 250 plates at the banquet. There would be people with incomes of $5,000 who would feel the sting of the serpent of taxation, because the Government would take $60 away from the man with an income of $5,000 a year.

There is great solicitude and heartaching for the man with a net income of $5,000, who must not be taxed as much as $60, because if we tax him $60, we are going to have to increase the taxes on the millionaire by about 55 per cent. We are told that a $5,000 income must not be taxed $60 a year, and some of those who are speaking that way are negotiating to take $140 a year out of the pockets of a little Federal employee who is making but $1,400 a year. Where is the consistency in that kind of legislation? Where is the consistency? You do not mind, you have no scruples against, taking $140 off the salary of a man who is making only $1,400 a year. I have been here in Washington a little bit. I do not owe these men and women in Washington anything, not a thing on the living earth.

I do not need any votes they have; in fact, I understand they have no vote. Down my way those people have long since been trained to vote against me if they could vote within the party, and out of the party it is the same. So I have nothing to gain and nothing to lose. But I have been here long enough to know that it is almost a crime—to me it would be a crime, to others it might not be and probably would not be. I have been here long enough to tell that if Congress should clip the salary of a man in the city of Washington earning $1,200, $1,400, $1,500, $2,000, $2,500, $3,000, $3,500, I want to tell you, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, it would do an act less justified by conditions than to think about trying to promote the Government business in that way. We are not asking anybody here to do anything that is going to make necessary that kind of action. This is a country for all.

Mr. President, I want to speak just a few minutes now about tax-exempt securities, which have been talked about to some extent. A great deal of talk has been indulged in about tax-exempt securities. I do not know whether that is due entirely to a lack of understanding or whether the Secretary of the Treasury is a man who will just not understand about tax-exempt securities.

It is said that if we put these taxes up very high, all the wealthy people and corporations will put their money into tax-exempt securities, that they will sell out their property and go into tax-exempt securities. They are going to sell them to the men in the bread line, and put the money in tax-exempt securities; they will have to sell them to the men in the bread line, because those are the only ones who could buy them this day and time. So they are going to sell out.

The facts are that reason and experience and history show that that is not a correct statement of the theory, that that argument is very unsound. The fact is that during these years, when there were all these tax-exempt securities, and during these years when there were all these supposed-to-be high income taxes, which were going to drive people into tax-exempt securities, during those very years, the financial interests of this country, instead of going into tax-exempt securities, put their money into enterprises which were not for the best interests of the country. It would have been a good thing if they had gone into tax-exempt securities, instead of making a chain store out of every store in this country, a chain store out of every drug store, a chain restaurant out of every restaurant, and a chain bank out of every bank.

If instead of extending themselves in every field and endeavor and enterprise and vocation, if instead of having monopolized every business, from the bootblack on up, until there was not an independent bootblack business or grocery business or dry-goods business or banking business which could exist and survive under the conditions—if instead of having monopolized all those businesses, they had contented themselves with investing in tax-exempt securities, my friends would have still been in the grocery business making a living to-day, men who have been put out by these chain stores, and so would your friends be the same way. They would have been in businesses which thrived. Oh, no; Mr. Mondell, of Wyoming, who, I believe was the floor leader over in the House of Representatives for the Republican Party, came down our way and warned the people that the big business men were going to invest all their money in tax-exempt securities. Lo and behold, instead of investing those funds in tax-exempt securites, they did no such thing. They are not going to do such a thing if this tax bill is enacted into law either. They put their funds out to monopolize and take over all business, to put up branch stores all over this country, until to-day there is not a single business on the living face of America that a young man can go into to-morrow and make a living out of. What are you going to train a boy to do? I do not know.

There is not a business on the living face of the globe that a boy can go into in America to-morrow and make a living from, and I make that statement on the floor of the Senate. I stated that 10 years ago. It is no new matter with me. Ten years ago I said that there was not a business on the face of the globe that had not been monopolized by these financial interests, extending themselves into every nook and corner to take over every business this country has in it. I began to say that as far back as 1916, and to publish articles to that effect, which have come too true much earlier than I originally anticipated.

The best thing that could happen, the best thing that could be possible, would be to break up this infamous chain situation, that has chained this whole country, so that now they are getting their chain accountants and their chain doctors and their chain lawyers, and nobody can make a living in any kind of a business or enterprise or profession to-day unless he is a part of a chain system.

They took the little store on the corner where a man was making $5,000 a year, and turned that business into a chain store, and paid the manager of it from $20 to $25 a week. How is a man to buy an automobile on a salary like that?

I say, Mr. President, and I say to the gentlemen of the Senate, that the best thing you could do—and I am afraid if you adopt the Connally amendment or the Couzens amendment it is not going to accomplish it—the best thing that could be done is to say to bloated capital, "We have a means here of keeping you from monopolizing every business in this country, by a tax system."

Let me go farther than that, however. There is another reason why tax-exempt securities are a virtue. There may be a State in the Union, but I do not think there is one, which has not a provision in its constitution or in its statutes—and I think it will be found probably as a part of every city charter—that a municipality or a State is limited in the interest which can be charged on its bonds. I know we have that limit in the constitution of my State, and I am sure it is in the constitution or statutes of Arkansas. I am positive that it is provided in the statutes of the Eastern States, or in the constitutions of the Eastern States, that only certain limited rates of interest can be charged on bonds issued by States or subdivisions of States.

Why is there an interest rate of 5 per cent? Why is there an interest rate in some jurisdictions of 4½ per cent? Why would we say that the bonds should be sold at such rates of interest as are paid most easily under the circumstances, and at the time when offered? Why can States say, "We will pay interest charges of only 5 per cent?" It is because of the fact that the State obligations and the municipal obligations are tax-exempt.

It is not within the power of Congress to tax State securities. Congress has not any such power. It will take an amendment of the Constitution of the United States to give the Congress of the United States power to impose a tax on States. The States are sovereign. They are superior to the Federal Government in matters of that kind. The Federal Government derives whatever power it gets from the States. The States do not derive their power from the Government.

Congress has no power to tax municipal or State securities, even if it wanted to.

Congress can tax Federal Government securities, but it can not tax the securities of a State government. That is the law, and it would take an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to give Congress the power to tax State securities. But let us say, for the simple sake of argument, that to-morrow Congress would have the right to tax State securities. Let us say that Congress would have that right. If they would tax the securities of the State of New York or the city of Chicago they would take money from the city of Chicago and the State of New York for the Federal Treasury and take that money away from that State or that city. Nothing would be gained. The States would be hurt a great deal more than the revenue would amount to which would be obtained for the Federal Government. The best thing that can possibly happen is for the States and municipalities to be financed. Unless they are financed they can not carry on their work that is far more important to the average man than anything that is done by the Federal Government in the way of Federal service.

That is the reason for tax-exempt securities. I have heard a great deal of talk here about tax-exempt securities. I do not think anyone in the Senate who studies the matter a minute does not realize that tax-exempt securities are a means of assisting the State, a means of helping the business of government.

I have waited and waited and waited for somebody to say this on the floor of the Senate, but it apparently has never occurred to anybody to say it yet. What is the reason for this hubbub and hurrah about tax-exempt securities? It is the Power Trust. It is the Waterworks Trust. It is the Electric Trust. They have been trying to make it impossible for the State and city governments to finance themselves for years and years so they would have to sell out their electric-light plants to the power interests and restrain themselves from operating waterworks in the municipalities and turn them over to the private interests. They have been trying to drive the country away from tax-exempt securities, trying to keep the States and municipalities from having electric-light plants owned by the States and by the cities, and from having municipal waterworks owned by the States and the cities.

They have carried on this humdrum and claptrap and humbug all over the country, doing everything they could by their might and main to leave the municipalities in such a deplorable state that they would have to sell their properties out and go back to private operation of electric light and power and water plants. They have succeeded in a large part of the country. They have succeeded in that nefarious undertaking and enterprise. Some of our great men here in the Senate are misled by that propaganda. They are misled by that kind of talk, and unwittingly and unconsciously they are being led into advocacy of the very thing that means the breakdown of public service and the grafting into private control of every utility that is owned by the public to-day.

Let me take the little city of Lafayette, La., as a typical example of what these people will do. The city of Lafayette got into financial difficulties. That is one of many similar instances in Louisiana. I have stopped the trusts from getting these properties down in that country, or helped to stop them. I have personally stopped them in many cases where I could, having certain powers as governor of the State.

I remember when the city of Lafayette was undertaking to finance itself. The only means, apparently, by which they could finance themselves was when the Power Trust came into that town and offered to buy out the electric-power company. The same thing happened in another town of about the same size in the northern part of the State. The only thing that saved these cities from being unable to keep their properties was the fact that they could issue tax-exempt securities. The trusts had the courage and the audacity to try to slip legislation through the State legislature to keep those municipalities from having the right to issue tax-exempt securities, for no other reason in the world than that they were trying to break down the credit of the municipalities so they could no longer continue such a thing as municipal waterworks or municipal electric light and power plants in those cities.

When we sit here and talk about any such thing as tax-exempt securities I am led to state that if Senators understood them as I do they would hear certain interests say they are in favor of the suggestion that we have a chain of drug stores, a chain of restaurants, a chain of banks, a chain of everything, to the point where no boy coming out of the university with an A. B. degree, an LL. B degree, or an M. A. degree, or a Ph. D. degree can to-morrow go into any business on the face of the globe and make a living. Then let them say, "Now that we have that accomplished, let us go a little bit farther and chain down every municipal government and State government, chain them all down until we have everything in the country in the hands of the chains."

Then let them say to themselves, "What have we left upon which to base the prosperity of America to-morrow? What is there left for the citizenship of this country to-morrow?" That is the situation we have to ponder and consider in this country.

Mr. President, I have seen this thing in a little different light than others. I am a man used to following. I am a man used to organization. I am a believer in organization.

I am a believer in political organization. I believe that in organization more can be accomplished than outside of organization. I hesitate at all times to set myself in opposition to party organization or to political organization. I am an organization man in principle.

Here in this body I have sought and undertaken to follow some one or some several in any line of thought and endeavor, where other men could go, that meant we were going to give a chance to the rising young manhood and womanhood of the country. I have undertaken to find the place; I have undertaken to find the men or set of men who were going to give to the average people of the United States a distribution of the profits of the land or a distribution and an equalization in the taxes collected upon the land in such way as to distribute those burdens among the people that were best able to bear them and thus bless the entire populace with a government and with the protection of the Nation that insured employment, that insured that the men and women were treated right, that insured a land where there was real liberty and true equality of opportunities among the people.

I have sought to find that kind of leadership in the Congress. I have sought to find that kind of leadership in the United States House of Representatives. When I have so found it I have followed it as far as it was safe. I found that kind of leadership in part in the Senate Committee on Finance. I found that capable type of leadership when, by a vote of 11 to 7, after having maturely studied the tax bill, they came out here and reported that incomes above $1,000,000 should be taxed 55 per cent.

But lo and behold! No sooner do I find that shining torch of liberty, no sooner do I find that impulse of liberality, no sooner do I seek the glow that could blossom and grow and spread until they formed a light for the entire population of the country, then I see the spirit of concentration, the spirit of centralization, break forth from the Treasury Department to the United States Senate and recommend that the Senate Finance Committee should do a quick "about face," and the recommendations and the compromise suggestions from the Secretary of the Treasury prevailed against what I conceived to be and now think to have been a full shining spark that was to be seen by the people of the country to come out of the Congress.

Mr. President, I understood we would probably recess at 10 o'clock. I have only 50 minutes left, and I hope to be able to complete my remarks on the bill by the time of the recess, because I do not want to infringe upon anybody's time to-morrow. I feel there is no one who cares to take up the remainder of the time this evening; and that being the case, I hope I am not infringing upon any rights that some other Senator may feel should be his.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest that if the Senator would promise the Senate he would not speak to-morrow he might get a promise of a recess now, if that is what the Senator was suggesting.

Mr. LONG. Would I have to promise not to speak to-morrow?

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator to say he did not intend to do so.

Mr. LONG. No; I do not intend to speak to-morrow on this particular amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, to-day when I saw the chairman of the Finance Committee get into disagreement with the ranking member of the committee on the Democratic side, I feared that I would be accused of having disturbed that harmony which has prevailed since they have been considering the matter. I do not know if all the Senators voted together on the 55 per cent proposal, whether the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] voted for the 55 per cent proposal in the committee or not when the vote was 11 to 7, or whether one of them voted for it and one of them voted against it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I can tell the Senator if he really wants to know.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I offered an amendment to the committee fixing the 45 per cent surtax and also an increase in the normal tax. It was adopted with 4 dissenting votes, I think. It was thought that that would be the final action. Then when we had summed up and finished our labors and certain propositions had been stricken from the bill in the form of excise taxes it was found that we needed $77,000,000 more. Then it was that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] offered the proposal which is now pending as an amendment, and it was adopted then as an emergency measure. I voted against it at that time for the reasons I have stated to-day.

Mr. LONG. The Senator voted against ever adopting it?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes. I do not know how the Senator from Utah voted. I voted a good many times differently from him and from the others.

Mr. LONG. I am not asking the Senator from Utah how he voted unless he cares to express himself. Of course, I would yield for that purpose, but I am not asking him.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely want to read a letter. It has been stated to-day many times that Secretary Mills came to the Senate to lecture the Senate Committee on Finance and force his views upon the committee.

Mr. LONG. I would like to have the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] to this statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The attention of the Senator from Michigan is requested.

Mr. COUZENS. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to read a letter written April 12 1932, as follows: :

MY DEAR SENATOR SMOOT: I understand from my telephone conversation with you that the Senate Finance Committee at a meeting this morning instructed you to request the Treasury Department to submit a program of revenue legislation adequate to balance the Budget.

That action was taken by the committee, and I have the minutes here.

I wish respectfully to call to your attention that after many weeks of careful study and mature consideration, the Secretary of the Treasury submitted to the Ways and Means Committee a well-balanced program intended to provide the necessary revenue in the existing emergency. Later, when on the basis of additional information the Treasury estimates of revenue were revised, I submitted to the Ways and Means Committee some suggestions supplementing the original Treasury program.

Subsequently, the Ways and Means Committee reported out a bill constructed on somewhat different lines from the Treasury program, but nevertheless constituting a well-balanced and sound revenue measure. I then stated that while the Ways and Means Committee bill did not conform to the original proposals submitted by this department, it was acceptable to the Treasury.

On Wednesday last I appeared before the Finance Committee and expressed in detail the views of this department regarding the revenue bill which passed the House of Representatives and is now before your committee for consideration. In the exhibits attached to my formal statement submitted to the Finance Committee I set forth a summary of the Treasury recommendations, the Ways and Means Committee proposals, and the House provisions. It seems to me, therefore, that the Treasury's position has been fully presented.

If the committee desires us to recommend a complete plan as an entire substitute for the House bill, I must refer you to the program submitted to the Ways and Means Committee or to the Ways and Means Committee bill, which I declared to be acceptable to this department. Either of these plans is preferable to the measure now before you. If, however, the Senate Finance Committee decides to deal with the problem by taking the House bill as the basis of the revenue measure which it will recommend to the Senate—and I am not to be understood as opposed to such a course—then I shall, of course, be only too glad to cooperate with the committee in any way I can in attempting to perfect this measure, and shall hold myself in readiness to appear before you at any time you may call upon me.

That letter was written on the 12th of April, and on the 13th of April, at the request of the committee, Mr. Mills wrote this letter:

At the recent hearings before the Senate Finance Committee on the pending revenue bill it was pointed out that this bill might be expected to yield more revenue for the fiscal year 1934 than was indicated by the Treasury's estimates for the fiscal year 1933. Reference was made more particularly to estimated collections from increased income, estate, and gift taxes, since estimates for the fiscal year 1933 do not reflect a full year's collections under the proposed new rates. The Treasury was requested to submit information on this point.

To estimate the revenues of the Government for the fiscal year 1934 would require forecasts, extending over a period of more than two years, at a time when the general economic situation is still affected by major elements of uncertainty. Such estimates would of necessity be subject to wide error.

The most helpful response which the Treasury can make to the committee's request is, I believe, to submit the inclosed table showing the estimated yield of changes provided for in H. R. 10236 for the fiscal year 1933 and for a full year of collections.

You will note that these estimates indicate total additional receipts in the amount of about $1,436,000,000 for the first full year of collections as compared with estimates of additional receipts for the fiscal year 1933 totaling $1,032,000,000, or an increase of about $404,000,000.

Very respectfully yours, OGDEN L. MILLS.

Then, at the request of the committee, he appeared before the committee. I have a copy of the Treasury Department estimates.

Mr. COUZENS. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. SMOOT. April 13.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Can the Senator holding the floor yield for the purpose of having an entire series of letters read in his time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it may be done.

Mr. TYDINGS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the Senator may yield only for a question.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland objected.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not need any help. I am perfectly willing to yield; that is all right.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to ask a question of the Senator, but the Chair does not want me to do so, and, therefore, I will not ask the Senator to yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator from Utah say what caused him to read those letters? I did not get the point, being over on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The object of reading the letters was this: Statements have been made to-day that when the Secretary of the Treasury came before the committee, the committee accepted his statement without change; in other words, that the Secretary of the Treasury dominated the committee and virtually dictated to it just what rates should be put into the bill. The committee asked the Secretary to come down there and make suggestions.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana can only yield for a question.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can only yield for a question, if there is objection.

Mr. LONG. I yield for a question only.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland has objected to the Senator's yielding, except for a question.

Mr. LONG. I can only yield for a question under the rule.

Mr. COUZENS. Will not the Senator yield the floor to me, and then he can get it back again?

Mr. LONG. Very well; I yield the floor to the Senator from Michigan.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana yields the floor, and the Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, evidently a question has arisen which caused the Senator from Utah to read a number of communications from the Secretary of the Treasury. I remember very well several hearings we had when the Secretary of the Treasury appeared, and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] requested him to submit a program. At one of the meetings the Senator from Mississippi was quite annoyed at the Secretary of the Treasury, and said that he had not fairly dealt with the committee because the Secretary did not submit a program. I think the Senator from Mississippi will verify that statement. As the result of the Senator's criticism of the Secretary, the communications the Senator from Utah has just read were written to the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. My letter to the Secretary was written, I will say to the Senator, at the request of the committee. I have just read the letter, and I have here, Mr. President, the full statement of the Budget submitted to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives and also the Budget estimates that were submitted to the Finance Committee. The Senator from Mississippi had also a Budget estimate, and more than three-fourths of the suggestions were exactly the same as those made by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think there is any controversy about the statement the Senator from Michigan has made. In the beginning of the hearings I asked the Secretary if he would submit a new program or whether he relied on his recommendations to the Ways and Means Committee. I did become somewhat vexed because I did not think the program was as specific as it should be.

Mr. COUZENS. Up to that point I think no criticism can be made of the Secretary of the Treasury or of the committee. But I want to say that for the benefit of the Senator from Louisiana. I submit, however, that from the time the committee went into executive session, after the close of the hearings, and particularly during the time when the committee held its meetings in the room of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Secretary of the Treasury never met with us.

Mr. SMOOT. He was never asked to do so.

Mr. COUZENS. I understand he was not asked to do so, but during all that time, when the committee for over two weeks was working morning and afternoon in executive session, they approved of the following things which were subsequently ordered out of the bill by the Secretary of the Treasury. For instance on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi we put back in the bill the 1½ per cent additional rate for filing consolidated returns, and an increase from 13½ per cent to 14 per cent on the profits of corporations was put in on motion of the Senator from Mississippi. At one time the committee took up the question of imposing an extra 1½ per cent for filing consolidated returns, but afterwards, on motion of the Senator from Mississippi, it was put back to the original figure. That is one thing the committee did after several motions had been invoked that came at the demand of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Another thing was this: After several hours of discussion and several roll calls the committee kept in the bill the tax on toilet articles. We had votes on the question of removing the tax on "dope," and perhaps some other things, but we did vote to retain the tax on toilet preparations, which would yield an estimated income of $15,000,000. After much discussion and many votes we decided to keep in the tax on furs, with some exceptions, to yield an anticipated revenue of $15,000,000. After much discussion as to what should be under the heading of sporting goods and cameras, from which it was estimated a 10 per cent tax would provide a revenue of six and a half million dollars, that tax was decided on, but it came out on the orders of the Secretary of the Terasury, as did the tax on toilet articles and furs.

I want to say further that I am giving the Secretary considerable free advertising, because all the interests that would be subject to these taxes are going to be delighted because the Secretary of the Treasury was able to order the committee to take them out of the bill.

Then there were several votes on the tax on firearms, from which an estimated income of two and a half million dollars would be derived, but that came out. We discussed the question of a tax on matches for hours and hours, and several amendments were offered increasing or lowering the rate of tax, which was to bring in a revenue of $11,000,000. That, however, came out on the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury. Candy! I want myself to take credit for having candy taken out of the provisions of the bill, because I made the motion to bring that about, and it was done.

When the duty on chewing gum was first put at 5 per cent, it was said that Mr. Wrigley or his estate was going to pay it, and we might as well leave it in. Some one, however, was sympathetic toward Mr. Wrigley's estate, and we cut the rate down to 3 per cent, which would yield an estimated income of $1,000,000.

Then there was in the bill a tax on soft drinks, estimated to yield $10,000,000 of revenue, but that came out.

Then some amendments were made in the administrative provisions after Mr. Mills came down and gave his orders; but, worst of all, when, after several votes, the committee had decided to raise 1 cent for every 10 cents of admission charges in excess of 45 cents, which it was estimated would yield a revenue of $40,000,000, on Mr. Mills's instructions the committee made the rate 1 cent for each 10 cents on admissions over 10 cents, with an estimated yield of revenue of $110,000,000. In other words, $70,000,000 would be taken out of the pockets of the common citizen who goes to the 10-cent, 20-cent, and 30-cent shows. That tax was raised at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The committee itself took out the tax on sales for future delivery on the produce market. I am not so sure about this, but I think that it was at the Secretary's request or suggestion or substitute plan or compromise, or whatever one may choose to call it, that the tax on the rentals of safety-deposit boxes was taken out, which would have yielded an estimated amount of $1,000,000.

It will be remembered that we closed the consideration of the bill on a Thursday night, and on that Thursday night the committee voted by 11 to 7 to incorporate the Connally schedule of rates. I say, without any disrespect to the Senator from Utah, that he was angry.

He pounded his desk and said, "We will have the Secretary down here"; and the next morning the Secretary was down there at 10 o'clock in the morning, with all his instructions. He had a paper in his hand. I was presiding at a meeting of the Committee on Interstate Commerce and was some 30 minutes late and did not get to the Finance Committee meeting in time to hear his statement. However, when I got to the committee room I found that all our two or three weeks' work had been cast aside and the committee had taken Mr. Mills's program. I resisted that action, all taken within less than an hour, and I asked that the Secretary be called back in the room again. He was called back. He had a paper in his hand from which he read. I said, "May not the committee have copies of these statements of yours?" and he said, "Well, I only have one copy," but he brought it over very courteously and handed it to me, and I looked at it. The committee refused to reconsider the admission taxes, for which action the Senator from California made an eloquent plea. I think for some 30 minutes he pleaded with the committee to reconsider its action; but, on a vote, the Senator from California got 6 votes for a reconsideration, while there were 12 votes against it.

Then the Secretary came over and said, "I want that paper back."

I said, "No; I want to see what this paper is." He pulled it out of my hand and said, "No; you can not have that paper." I said, "Did any of the other committee members have it?" I said, "I saw the chairman have one of these papers." He said, "I will send you a copy of it." But he did not send me a copy of it. He sent me a copy of the rates, but not the memorandum from which he read.

After nearly three weeks of hard work, the committee took the Secretary's substitute program in 30 minutes; and here is what he included in it:

He eliminated all of the taxes upon which we had spent hours and hours, and which I have previously referred to, and which are referred to in the chairman's report to the Senate on the bill. He included a manufacturers' excise tax on lubricating oil, which we also had in there. He raised the truck and automobile taxes from 3 to 4 per cent, and he added a tax of 5 cents per pound on import rubber, estimated to raise $53,000,000 of revenue.

There had been no hearings. No one had testified as to the effect that this would have upon any industry, nor had there been an opportunity of ascertaining the probable income from this tax. So I notified the Senator from Utah that we ought to have hearings, and that I would insist on hearings.

After some of the industry had protested the Senator very graciously arranged to grant hearings, but only after the bill had been reported to the Senate. After extensive hearings, this program of $53,000,000, made up of 5 cents per pound on imported rubber, was entirely revised; and the chairman, I understand, was authorized by the committee to report a substitute or a committee amendment to the rubber amendment whereby we will impose a tax of 3 cents a pound on tires and 5 cents a pound on inner tubes.

So I want to make it plain that that is the history of the tax bill after Mr. Mills came down there; and it was all done within 30 minutes.

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator told how the committee advanced and how it retreated many times on various items, but the Senator omitted to tell about the whirligig on the tariff proposition—how many times we went up the hill and how many times we went down. Will not the Senator edify the Senate by telling what happened with reference to the tariff items?

Mr. COUZENS. I am perfectly willing to edify the Senate with respect to the tariff rates.

I remember that when it came to the question of oil there was a vote or two shy, and I think the Senators had some difficulty with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], because the Senator from Rhode Island said the proposed tariff was going greatly to increase the cost of oil on the Atlantic coast. We argued for hours about whether it should be 1 cent on crude, or 1 cent on fuel, or 1 cent on gasoline, or 2½ cents on gasoline, or 3 cents on gasoline. We spent hours and hours on it, and I think we eventually bribed the Senator from Rhode Island [laughter] by saying that we would cut it in half, make it half a cent, if he would only vote for it. I did not vote for any of the rates on oil. So at last they got the Senator to switch by cutting the rate to half a cent a gallon; and that is the oil tariff.

I do not think there were any ups and downs on copper, because I voted for copper all the time.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes. The Senator realizes that copper was stripped from the bill first, and then they got enough votes to put copper in.

Mr. COUZENS. But I think copper went out on a general motion, did it not?

Mr. HARRISON. No; it went out on a separate vote. There was a separate vote, and it went out.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] came in and was very modest, and only asked for a slight tariff on lumber.

Mr. HARRISON. Which was rejected at first, but finally was agreed upon when the other items were agreed upon.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; and then he did not ask for any tariff on shingles or pulpwood, and as long as he was so modest we let him in.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, it is very apparent from the statement made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], which I understand is evidently consistent with the ideas of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], that after three weeks of labor on the part of the brightest minds that can be found in the Senate—and that means the world—the Secretary of the Treasury came down to the committee and undid practically everything they had done, and gave them an entirely new schedule; and, as I heard the remarks of the Senator from Michigan, he did not even have a copy to hand out to members. One of them asked for a copy, and he said, "I have not a copy. I have only one copy. I will let you look at this, but that is all." He had not even a copy to give them; and this was done in 30 minutes!

My purpose has been to rediscuss the logic of the Senators themselves in the few moments I have taken here this evening [laughter]—to rediscuss, to call back to their own minds their own logic and their own line of reasoning and their own eminent counsel.

I am standing by the committee. I believe it is the duty of the Senate to back up the committee. I will follow the advice of these distinguished men, with whom I have been closely associated here for several months, and whose lines of reasoning I know to be good. If they have been inveigled, or if they have been, I should say, consciously or unconsciously misled away from their own opinions, I believe that we who know of their sagacity and of their learning and of their skill should undertake to return to this committee, that they may return to themselves—not as the Scripture says, "Ephraim is joined unto idols; let him alone," but they have to be returned to their knowledge and to their own ideas of this matter.

We did not send the committee out to write up a bill for Mr. Mills. We could have suspended the rules of the Senate and allowed Mr. Mills to have come here and to have given us this bill direct. Why have all this money spent by the Senate in order that the Senate Finance Committee can report a bill, and after three weeks of expense and turmoil and sacrifice on the part of this committee, and their labors and their agonizing hours of toil and worry, have them come in here when they are given recommendations by the Secretary of the Treasury and reverse themselves and present something else?

The better practice, Mr. President, would be to take the direct course; and I think it is in order. If this kind of thing keeps going on in the Senate, if we continue as we have been going here, I intend to propose an amendment to the rules of the Senate, to simplify our procedure, that the member of the Cabinet be allowed to come to the Senate himself and give his recommendations or instructions to the Senate. I think we ought to apply to the Rules Committee of the Senate for the preparation of such a rule; and I will yield to a unanimous-consent agreement that we avoid this cumbersome system of having the members of the Cabinet go through the committee after the committee spent three weeks in attempting to find out something that it did not find out. In order to avoid all this cumbersome and useless task and toil, I will yield to a motion at this time to amend the rules so that we may allow the members of the Cabinet to come before the Senate and give their directions direct, or, rather, their recommendations direct, rather than having to go through three weeks of worry.

I ask the Senator from Michigan, and the Senator from Mississippi, and the Senator from Utah, why your labors for three weeks to give the Senate a bill that can properly tax wealth in this land, and the common man along with it, to be fair about it? Why these three weeks of labor if you are going to wake up some morning, bright and early, after you have already voted all these things in, after all your study, and within 30 minutes you are going to have the Secretary of the Treasury come down and say this and you vote this, and say that and you vote that, and most of the things that you have done are undone in the twinkling of an eye?

I submit, Mr. President, that we ought to amend the rules of the Senate, and I think probably it would be in the interest of expedition. There is no reason why the Secretary of the Treasury should not be down here before the balance of us. Why have him give such indirect recommendations, so effective, so logical, so speedy of determination and action, regardless of three weeks' decisions to the contrary? Why have this cumbersome operation?

We are not arguing with the committee to-day. This is not an argument with the committee. This is an argument as to whether the committee's well-founded judgment will prevail with itself and with the Senate instead of the hastily formed and rendered opinion that the Secretary of the Treasury suggests early one morning and is so hastily acceded to.

We can not balance the Budget in this way. Your country is calling you. Our people are calling us. The people of America are calling us to relieve them from the distress that has infested this entire Nation as the result of following the Cabinet officers of the present administration. Your people are asking you to deliver them from this condition that now exists. They are asking relief. Had they wanted relief from the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, they would have petitioned the Secretary, or they would have petitioned the President of the United States. But they have petitioned their Congress, and those petitions have been fruitless; and now their Congress meets, and the witnesses appear not before the Secretary of the Treasury—I hope I am not making a misstatement of fact. Did the witnesses in that hearing appear and give their testimony before the Secretary of the Treasury? Were those witnesses testifying before the Secretary of the Treasury?

If they have not testified before the Secretary of the Treasury; and you, after having decided the case one way upon the basis of the sworn testimony you have heard, have in the twinkling of an eye disregarded the testimony and accepted the recommendation of another man; you have decided against those people without their right to be heard. You at least ought to have impounded the Secretary of the Treasury and allowed him to have heard witnesses in the case. It was not right to substitute judges without allowing the witnesses to be heard. It was not the right thing to go out and take this bill and rewrite the whole thing in 30 minutes' time, without anybody even having a copy, and let Mr. Mills come down here without those witnesses being heard.

Why have you taken the testimony of those witnesses for three weeks—those people standing there with their hands raised to Almighty God, swearing to testify to the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth? For three weeks' time that has been done, and then you have taken the testimony and thrown it into the garbage can and asked for the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury—or whether you asked for it or not, you have been given the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, before whom they never had the opportunity to testify.

Mr. President, I think that the members of this committee in fairness to themselves, if they are driven to abrogate their own ideas to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury, owe it to themselves to call a hearing in this matter, to call the witnesses before them, and to hear the testimony as it falls from their lips, because we have spent the money of the United States to have these hearings before the Senate Finance Committee; and the Senate Finance Committee, after due and deliberate hearings, has decided the case of the people of the United States, and then, after they have heard the witnesses and decided the case of the people of the United States of America, to relieve them to some extent, we hope, at least, from the distress which now prevails, they substitute another man, who passes upon the whole business, and they have been shut out practically without a hearing. Give me a chance to go before Mr. Mills and testify when he is going to make a recommendation that is going to be substituted for a recommendation previously made by the committee. That would be my alternative for the situation.

Mr. President, we can not balance the Budget. That has become the great term, "Balance the Budget." That has become the great slogan, that comes to us in the form of a half-baked crust that is about to envelope us and be spattered on us at any hour or any moment. That is a dilemma from which there is seemingly no rescue. That is a phrase which has become a nightmare, "Balance the Budget." Many of us do not know what it means yet. Balance the Budget! Balance the Budget! People have written to me about balancing the Budget. What does balancing the Budget mean? What does it mean?

We propose to assist to carry out the idea which the committee originally adopted to balance the Budget. The rates are proposed. You do not have to take the Connally amendment entirely or the Couzens amendment entirely. I have two amendments right along the same lines, not differing materially. But at least you should be fair enough with yourselves—and I know every Member of the Senate wants to be fair with himself—to take the time to review this case, read the splendid speech that has been made here this afternoon by the senior Senator from the State of Georgia.

Read the words of wisdom he uttered as a member of the Committee on Finance, his very careful, well-modulated, considered reasoning, in which remarks, as I understood him to-day, he said that possibly and most probably the best thing to do under the circumstances would be to go ahead and do as the committee started to do, and to put the Connally amendment into the bill. He would not bind himself against even the schedules proposed by the Senator from Michigan unless it should be shown that the estimates of the revenues asserted by the Senator from Michigan were found to be correct.

Let us pause here a moment. This is a government of law. Let us pause here a moment and let us think. We are asked to tax 120,000,000 people and keep them from going to moving-picture shows. We are asked to put an unjustifiable tax upon every man buying an automobile in this country. An automobile is no longer a luxury. A Ford automobile is no luxury for the ordinary man who buys one for his family. You are about to put a tax on him. You are about to put a tax on the radio. You are about to put taxes on 120,000,000 people, and call upon every one of the 120,000,000 to take knowledge and cognizance of the statutes of the United States, because they are all presumed to know the contents of the statutes.

Every living one of them who does not pay the particular levy in each and every separate instance, as prescribed in this voluminous and most nefarious bill, will be liable to indictment and prosecution before United States courts for a penal offense under the statute. You have given us something that has never been in this country before. Such a cumbersome tax system has never before been started. This is the first time we have ever gone to any such extent as this act proposes. Never before have we ever gone to anything like as far as this act undertakes to go. And why are we to do this now? There is no reason whatever, except that Mr. Mills came before the Senate Finance Committee or the House Committee on Ways and Means when the propositions were before the committees to increase the income schedules on two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, and nine thousand dollar incomes. He had not shown his head before. But, oh, my, when they got up to the point where they raised the rate of the income tax on a man who was making a hundred thousand or two hundred thousand and ran it up to where a man who made a million dollars had to pay 55 per cent of his income in taxes, then, we are told, the S O S went out. "Call up our friend the Secretary. We have had a vote on this thing, and it is not right, and I am going to send for the Secretary of the Treasury to come down here. We will just see about this thing. He will come, in this land of the free and home of the brave, whether the committee is going to mess up things around here or not. I will send for the Secretary. He will come here. That is what I will do."

The Secretary comes. There may be some people in this country who do not admire the Secretary of the United States Treasury. There may be some who dispute his ability. But, with the admiration that I have for the members of the Senate Committee on Finance—and it is a great admiration—the way the Senate committee stopped and stood face around, right quick, double time, was a wonderful thing to behold. I am an admirer of the Secretary of the United States Treasury. He is some man; and I think that anyone who doubts the wisdom of my good friend the distinguished Senator from Utah, anyone who doubts his wisdom or his logic in sending for the Secretary of the United States Treasury on this occasion, is simply demonstrating that he is without good, clear logic. He sent for the man to deliver the goods, and he got the man who delivered the goods. There was not any question about it.

> Theirs not to reason why,
> Theirs but to do and die.
> Into the valley of death
> Rode the six hundred.

[Laughter.]

So they came out.

> Cannon to right of them,
> Cannon to left of them.

They came out with the bill. What were those cannons? "We have to balance the Budget. This thing has to be done."

Out they came with the bill.

Mr. President, back on the old farm in the parish of Winn I used to read Democratic logic from my friend the Senator from Mississippi, and think of the day when I would get enough money to go and hear him deliver another one of those speeches. I never got there. I read the logic of democracy and the great ideals of government as I used to go to the old printing office in my home town of Winnfield and read those splendid speeches on the great republican form of government by the distinguished Senator from Utah.

O Mr. President, I used to read the philippics and the famous addresses of the other celebrated and learned men of this country, and I would sit and build clay ideals before my eyes of those defenders of constitutional government, of democracy, and of liberty and people's rights. And then when I come here and find that after three weeks they decided something, that another man tells them something else, and they decide the other way in three minutes, I begin to wonder just how, just why, and I yet believe in the talents and the judgments of those men who have meant so much to this country, and will still mean so much, properly and freely exercised, freed from any recommendations whatever that come from the Secretary of the Treasury, based upon the testimony as they see it; that the judgment which they could render and which they did render and which they ought to have rendered ought to be the deliberate judgment of the Senate, and that should be the appeal to rectitude which we should follow, undertaking to guide ourselves aright, and have them go the right way themselves.

I have great charity. There is a great deal more work to be done. We are on the threshold of a decision as to whether we are going to have a change in Government or not. I read a statement from the Secretary of the Interior, Professor Wilbur, a very fine man, in which he said that this form of government we had was a monstrosity, that we ought to set up a kind of board or commission that would understand government to run things, that running around here with two Houses of Congress and all of this business of people voting, was not any government at all, and was not the idea at all. I waited to see whether or not that would be agreed to by the President of the United States. I saw no dissent from it. A few days ago I read that the President of the United States has in mind that there ought to be some war-time powers placed back in his hands to deal with the situation.

Oh, yes; that is in the paper. Why? Apparently we are going a long way toward that. Apparently we are going a long way toward that extreme, when our distinguished colleagues—as fine a set of Senators as ever sat in a deliberative body under the living, shining canopy of heaven as long as there has been one—feel, under the impulse and strain of circumstances, that they have to labor with witnesses for three weeks, and after we plead with them to return unto their own judgment, to return unto their own opinions, to give to the people of this country what seems to be necessary and best for the welfare of the Public Treasury in all its various and sundry domestic and foreign affairs—and then a superruler tells them what to do.
